The next section authorizes Congress to restrain the bank from issuing notes of less denomination than twenty dollars, if it shall see fit so to do, any time after March, 1836. This, too, is borrowed from the bill of 1832, and its object was fully discussed on that occasion. That object is to get rid of the circulation of all notes under five dollars, and, by so doing, to extend the specie basis of our circulation. When the States shall direct their own banks to issue no notes less than five dollars, then it is proposed that Congress shall direct the Bank of the United States to issue no notes below twenty dollars. The state of our currency will then be, as I explained the other day, that, up to five dollars, the currency will be silver and gold; above five dollars, it may be silver and gold and notes of State banks; and above twenty dollars, silver and gold and notes of State banks and notes of the Bank of the United States. This greater use of silver and gold, for common purposes, and small payments, I have thought to be a desirable object, as I have often before said.

The next section looks to the winding up of the affairs of the bank; and it provides that, at any time within the last three years of its continuance, its directors may divide, among the stockholders, any portion of the capital which they may have withdrawn from active operation. The remaining sections are only such as are formal and necessary; one continues the acts of Congress connected with the bank, such as those providing for forging its notes; and the other requires the acceptance of this bill by the bank, in order to give it validity and effect.

Such, Mr. President, are the provisions of this bill. They are few and simple.

1. The bank is to be continued for six years.
2. The deposits are to be restored after the 1st of July.
3. Congress is to be at perfect liberty to create any new bank, at any time after March, 1836.
4. The directors, in order to wind up their concerns, may, three years before the six years expire, begin to divide the capital among the stockholders.

Mr. President, this is the measure which I propose; and it is my settled belief that, if we cannot carry this, we can carry nothing.

I have thus, sir, stated my opinions, and discharged my duty. I see the country laboring, and struggling, and panting under an enormous political evil. I propose a remedy which I am sure will produce relief, if it be adopted, and which seems to me most likely to obtain support. And now, sir, I put it to every member of Congress, how he can resist this measure, unless by proposing another and a better. Who, among the agents and servants of the people assembled in these Houses, is prepared, in the present distressed state of the country, to say, that he will oppose every thing, and propose nothing? For one, sir, I can only say, that I have been driven to this proposition by an irresistible impulse of obligation to the country. If I had been suddenly called to my great reckoning in another world, I should have felt that one duty was left unattempted, if I had no measure to recommend, no expedient to propose, no hope to hold out to this suffering community.

As to the success of this bill, sir, or any other, I have only to repeat what I have so often said, that every thing rests with the people themselves. In the distracted state of the public councils, any measure of relief can only be obtained by the decisive demand of the public will.

By an exercise of executive power, which I believe to be illegal, and which all must see to have been injurious—by an unrelenting adherence to the measure which has thus been adopted, in spite of all consequences, and by the force of those motives which influence men to support the measure, though they entirely disapprove it, the country is brought to a condition, such as it never before witnessed, and which it cannot long bear. But it is not a condition for despair. Nothing will ruin the country, if the people themselves will undertake its safety; and nothing can save it, if they leave that safety in any hands but their own.

Would to God, sir, that I could draw around me all these twelve millions of people; would to God, that I could speak audibly to every independent elector in the whole land. I would not say to them, vainly and arrogantly, that their safety and happiness required the adoption of any measure recommended by me. But I would say to them, with the sincerest conviction that ever animated man's heart, that their safety and happiness do require their own prompt and patriotic attention to the public concerns, their own honest devotion to the welfare of the State. I would say to them, that neither this measure, nor any measure, can be adopted, except by the cogent and persisting action of popular opinion. I would say to them, that the public revenues cannot be restored to their accustomed custody; that they cannot be again placed under the control of Congress; that the violations of law cannot be redressed, but by manifestations, not to be mistaken, of public sentiment. I would say to them, that the constitution and the laws, their own rights and their own happiness, all depend on themselves; and if they esteem these of any value; if they were not too dearly bought by the blood of their fathers; if they be an inheritance fit to be transmitted to their posterity, I would beseech them—I would beseech them—to come now to their salvation.

Mr. LEIGH said: He hoped the Senate would indulge him, if he took this early opportunity to indicate, frankly and distinctly, the opinion he entertained on this important subject, and the course he should pursue in regard to it. Indeed, some remarks which had fallen from the gentleman from Massachusetts, if he rightly understood the allusions they imported, seemed to render such an explanation from him necessary.

It is known to the Senate, said he, that, among the resolutions adopted by the General Assembly of Virginia, during its last session, which have heretofore been laid before both Houses of Congress, there was one declaring the opinion that the Federal Government had no constitutional authority to incorporate a national bank; it contains, indeed, no positive instruction to the Senators representing the State in this House; but it is a deliberate, solemn expression of the sense of the legislature; and, I have no doubt, of the general sense of the people of Virginia on the subject; and this with reference to the question of the renewal of the charter of the present Bank of the United States. It is known to the Senate, too, that I must have accepted the trust which a place in this body imposes, with full knowledge of the resolution to which I have adverted. Under these circumstances, knowing what was expected of me when I was elected, representing the sovereignty of the State, and informed, as I am, of her opinion and her will, even if I entertained a different opinion, I should be incapable of so far misrepresenting her, as to vote for a re-charter of the Bank of the United States, for any length of time, however short, or with any modifications whatever. But, in truth, I concur in the opinion of my constituents on the constitutional question, and that entirely and exactly. I have examined the arguments for the constitutionality of such a corporation, over and over again, deliberately, and, I hope, impartially; I think I understand them; and I am quite sure that the opinion I have formed is the result of my best judgment. At the same time, remembering that the opposite opinion has been entertained by so many enlightened men, by a large majority of the States composing this Union, and by a large majority, too, of the people of the United States, I cannot say that the incorporation of a national bank, on the principles on which the present bank has been framed, is palpably unconstitutional; that would be a degree of presumption; a want of respect for the opinion of others; a pretension to infallibility, which I am incapable of. All I say is, that their reasoning has not convinced me. Without entering at large upon the topics of argument that belong to the question, I shall only remark, at present, that the power to create such an institution has been claimed as an incidental power, and chiefly as incidental to the power of this Government to regulate the currency of the United States, and to the power delegated to it to levy taxes, and to collect and disburse the revenue. Now, as to the first, the constitution contains no grant of power to regulate the currency; it only empowers Congress to coin money, and regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coins, to which I cannot see how a power to create a bank paper currency, or to regulate a bank paper currency created by the States, can be incidental. As to the other, I can easily understand that a national bank may be, and has been, made an agent for safe-keeping and distributing the public revenue—a convenient agent—but the question with me is, whether it is necessary and proper, or at all appropriate, for the purpose? Among the various arguments against the constitutionality of the bank, there is one which has had much weight on my mind, and which I do not remember to have seen fairly met and answered. Considering the power to incorporate a national bank as incidental to the power of collecting and distributing the revenue, it is obvious that the fiscal agency of such an institution, in which consists the execution of the power, is only an incidental effect of the bank. The main purposes of the bank are to create a stock for the profit of the stockholders; a credit for the accommodation of individual dealers; a bank paper currency, of universal circulation, for the general use of the country; and such being the main purposes, the fiscal agency of the bank, in safe-keeping and distributing the public revenue—an agency wholly unconnected with the main purposes of the institution—is required of it, as part (though, I admit, a very important part) of the consideration it pays for the privileges conferred by its charter. If this Government may do any thing, which, though in the principal design, purpose, and effect, it has no manner of relation to the powers delegated by the constitution, may yet incidentally have an effect to execute any of them, I can really see no limitation whatever to the incidental powers of this Government.

[SENATE.]

Suppose, for example, Congress should incorporate a company, with an exclusive privilege to transport all passengers travelling through the country, for its own emolument, upon condition that it should also transport the mail free of charge, and be responsible for all losses that should occur to individuals or the public, through neglect, accident, embezzlement, or robbery; this might be a very convenient method of transporting the mail, a great saving of expense to the Government and to the people, and a complete security, or rather an insurance of remittances by post; and yet the monopoly of the transportation of passengers would be the direct main purpose of such an institution, while the transportation of the mail would only be an incidental effect of it. Would any one maintain that such an incorporation would be constitutional? It must not be supposed that I put the case as one exactly like the incorporation of a national bank; I am sensible of the points of diversity; my only purpose is to illustrate the proposition, that the incidental effect of any measure to carry into execution any of the powers of this Government, cannot render the measure constitutional, so far as it affects the main design and purpose, if these be nowise referable to any of the delegated powers. I am much more apprehensive of the general mischief which may flow from the admission of such a principle of construction, than I am of any particular mischief that can possibly flow from the application of it, now in question—the incorporation, namely, of a national bank.

But though the people of Virginia do entertain the opinion, and have uniformly maintained it, and, I think, upon just grounds, that this Government has no constitutional authority to charter a national bank, the developments of the present year, now in rapid progress, may serve to convince them that the renewal of the charter of the present bank, with such modifications and for such a term as experience has shown or shall dictate to be proper, may be the only means which human wisdom can devise, to avert or to correct measures far more unconstitutional, more abhorrent in principle from their opinions, and more dangerous and baleful in their consequences. The alternatives but too likely to be presented to us are, indeed, awful.

It may soon appear manifest to all the world, that the natural death, or the violent destruction, of the existing bank, which has been essayed, is to be only the prelude to the scheme of another national bank, constructed on the same general principle, with as large or larger capital, and obnoxious to the same constitutional objections as the present bank, with these only differences: that the mother bank will be located in New York, instead of Philadelphia, and the direction put under the absolute control and dominion of the President of the United States. The first may serve to conciliate a powerful popular influence to the support of the scheme: the last will give the President far more of real substantial power than the whole patronage of the Government now vested in his hands (which has given him power enough, and too much already) can be made capable of exerting; a power to dispense the wealth of the nation; a power over men in their private affairs; a power to tempt or to constrain them into passive submission to the Executive will. I am aware that the present Chief Magistrate (if I may credit the reports of the committees that have waited on him on the subject of the deposits, the truth of which I cannot doubt) has said that he will never consent to a renewal of the charter of the present bank, or to the incorporation of another bank; but then, if I understand the meaning of his words, he has only resolved never to give his consent to either of these measures, until his experiment of making the State banks serve the purpose of the fiscal agency which the Bank of the United States has performed, shall have failed; and I apprehend he may say, with perfect truth, at any moment, (indeed, at the present moment,) that the experiment has failed. I hope there are some means within the power of Congress, to ascertain the state of the Treasury: for my own part, I am expecting the disclosure with the utmost anxiety. Then, sir, I cannot help remembering that the President, in his veto message, told Congress and the nation, that, if he had been consulted, he could have given such a plan of a national bank as he would have approved. I speak from memory, and do not pretend to quote his words; but I am sure of the import of them. The President, therefore, is of opinion that there may be a national bank constructed which will be nowise unconstitutional, and he will give Congress the plan, if it will only consent to the introduction of Poyning's law; that law so cunningly devised to keep Ireland in subjection to the crown of England; that law, by which the Irish Parliament could pass no bill, except such, the heads of which were furnished from the castle. They who tell us that the President thinks this Government has no constitutional power to incorporate a national bank, either forget his avowal of opinion in one of the most solemn acts of his official life, or they do not think he was sincere. No, sir; the President does not concur with the General Assembly of Virginia on this point. He may, with perfect consistency, approve a charter of a bank which shall be conformed with his ideas of expediency; and, as his avowed objection to the present one is, that it is capable of interfering with his Government, we may infer that he will approve the charter of another bank so constructed as to be under the control of his Government; and if he will not, his successor may. An honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. WADE] has, I understand, explicitly declared his opposition to the renewal of the charter of the present bank, and to a charter of any other national bank. I do not question his sincerity. But I know that all men are, more or less, the creatures of circumstances; that strong temptation or imperious necessity has often changed men's opinions, and yet oftener their course of conduct; they may mount to a degree of intensity which no human firmness can resist; and I think it not at all improbable that the developments of this present year (1834) may serve to show the people of Virginia the imminent danger, not to say certain prospect, of a new bank, over the direction of which an overruling influence will be given to the President, and which will thus combine the tendency of the present bank to consolidation, with an accelerated tendency of the Government to monarchy. If such an alternative be presented to us, we must make our choice of evils.

Or, perhaps, the developments of the present year may open to us the prospect of that bank of the United States, the scheme of which was darkly intimated to the public in the first message of the President to Congress, at the first session after his first inauguration, the same that was commonly called a Treasury bank. I do not know that I fully penetrated the design; perhaps it was not intended to be intelligible to ordinary minds; or, perhaps, it was, at the time, in a crude, undigested state; but, as I understood it, (indeed, I could make nothing else of it,) the plan was to convert the revenue of the United States, between the time of the collection and the disbursement of it, into a bank capital, to be managed by the Treasury, under the control of the President. Now, sir, suppose the alternative shall be presented to us, whether the charter of the existing Bank of the United States shall be renewed, or such a Treasury bank as this established? Such a Treasury bank as this! It would give the President the means of purchasing a crown; no matter whether he should employ those means or not, they would constitute the potentiality of kingly dominion, and I would not trust such faculty to any President; no, not if he were the father from whose loins I sprung; a power dangerous to his own virtue, destructive of the virtue of the people; odious, fatal, damnatory of our free institutions.

At all events, sir, the developments of the present year must enlighten us as to the nature and effect of the scheme, which, so far as any scheme has been announced to the Senate by any friend of the administration on this floor, or announced to the public by the President, in those answers of his to the committees from the great cities, is the scheme of the Government; and that is, to leave things exactly in their present state. The President has formed a league of State banks of his own selection, in which he has deposited the public moneys collected at the places where they are respectively located, reserving power to himself to withdraw these deposits from them at his pleasure. He has power to examine their condition at any time, and to scrutinize their conduct. Congress has no such power. He has urged them to trade on the deposits, for the purpose of giving accommodation to the public, which, we may be sure, they are naturally inclined to do, without his prompting. Now, in the first place, I ask any man who concurs with me in the opinion that this Government (I use the phrase now in its proper sense, meaning the whole Government) has no constitutional authority to create a national bank, for the purpose of making it a fiscal agent, how can he possibly think that the President has constitutional authority to frame a league of State banks, and make them fiscal agents? Is there any man who can be reconciled to a measure which he objects to as having a tendency to consolidation, by the circumstance that it has also a tendency to monarchy? In the next place, I say, that, by this scheme, the President has secured to himself, if not directly a power to dispose of the public treasure in the interval between the collection and the disbursement of it, yet an absolute control over the State banks of deposits, which is very nearly the same thing. Take the Manhattan Bank, again, for instance. Its capital, by charter, is only two millions of dollars. The public revenue collected in New York is, at least, twelve millions of dollars; one half of which, six millions of dollars, is deposited in the Manhattan Bank. All banks trade on the average amount of the deposits confided to them, which is ascertained by experience. Let us suppose, then, that the average amount of deposits of the moneys of the United States on which the Manhattan Bank will trade, is one-third of the whole amount of the deposits. I am not pretending to accuracy in these estimates, neither is accuracy necessary to my purpose. Then the President will have given this bank a capital to trade on equal to the whole amount of its capital by charter. What becomes of the authority of the State legislature of New York, which has limited its capital to two millions of dollars? But let the bank proceed to trade on the public deposits, no matter how cautiously, and then let it presume to disobey any orders from the President, however unreasonable; let his suspicions be aroused, with or without cause; and let him, through mistake, or caprice, or anger, or passion for conquest, withdraw the public deposits from it, and leave the bank an overtrader exactly to the amount to which it has traded on the deposits, who does not see that the bank, in such a state of things, must be placed in imminent jeopardy, if not condemned to instant bankruptcy? that to avoid the danger of ruin, it must be his slave? And who doubts which alternative this artificial being, without heart or soul, bound by the law of its nature to follow its interest, must embrace? The power which the President has secured to himself over this league of State banks is quite as unconstitutional as the incorporation of a national bank by Congress; indeed, much more plainly so, and far more pernicious; for it is not only an assumption of power not delegated by the constitution, but it is an appropriation of the usurped power to the Executive department. If an attempt shall be made to regulate the exercise of this power by law, we shall see whether the object can, by any contrivance, be accomplished; meantime it requires no political sagacity to perceive, that, if the prevalent notions of Executive prerogative shall be sustained, all such attempts must be vain and nugatory.

The developments of the present year may open another view to the people of Virginia, and of this whole Union. It is, I presume, known to every body who has bestowed the least attention on the subject, that it was by means of the public deposits, the connexion of its branches with the mother bank and with each other, and the consequent absence of all rivalry among them, that the Bank of the United States has been enabled, and that it has been its interest, to facilitate exchanges between the different parts of the country at so moderate a rate. The members of this league of State banks are no more likely than those of other leagues to be exempt from rivalry; nor will even the master influence of the President be able to make them work in perfect harmony. The revenue of the United States, collected at the port of New York, is equal at least to $12,000,000. The deposits of this immense sum is divided between two State banks; and these State banks are to make distribution of it throughout the United States. This must give them, I should think, and through them the city of New York, a vast proportion of the whole business of the domestic exchange of the United States; add to which, in consequence of the concentration of so large a proportion of the import trade of the country in that city, every dealer in foreign merchandise in the South, West, Southwest, and Northwest, must have money current in New York, or credit there. I am not able to estimate the value of such advantages, nor, indeed, sure that I clearly understand them. I am throwing out hints for the consideration of others better informed. Will not New York avail herself of all such advantages? What shall prevent her from availing herself of them to the uttermost? Will she not make the utmost profit of them she can? When or where has there existed any community of men who did not pursue their own interests, and avail themselves of every opportunity and every means of advancing them? I do not mean to insinuate that the people of New York are more selfish than others; I do them no such injustice; I only think them like other men. And, sir, I am very much deceived, if the continuance of the President's system of measures (if its continuance can by any means be accomplished) will not have the effect, in the end, whatever may be their present sufferings under it, to subject the whole trade of the country to the city of New York. Now, sir, I am not conscious of any jealousy of New York; any envy of her prosperity: on the contrary, I sincerely rejoice at the spectacle of her prosperity, as I do in the prosperity of every part of the country, when it is derived from its peculiar advantages, its own capital, industry, and enterprise. But if the action of the Government gives her advantages which she otherwise could never enjoy—advantages to be enjoyed at the expense of others; if the tendency of public measures is to constitute her the Rome of this great empire; then it will become the people of Virginia, and of every other State in the Union, to inquire whether the Bank of the United States shall be put down, in order to give such an ascendancy to the city of New York as will make her mistress of the Union.

The developments of this year may present yet another and far more vital question to the people—the question, whether and how this Union shall be longer preserved? I mention it with a feeling of trembling anxiety and awe; for there is some degree of mischief even in talking publicly about the dissolution of the Union; but these are times in which we ought to look before us, and examine the dangers in prospect, in order to avoid them. If the existing bank had been permitted to die a natural death, and the term allowed for winding up its affairs had been extended from time to time, its debtors might have been able to meet their engagements, if not without inconvenience, yet without sacrifice and ruin. The attempt to antedate its doom, to destroy it suddenly and violently, has produced its natural consequence—a state of convulsion that distorts and racks every part of the body politic. Let gentlemen remember the amount of debt due in the Western country to the Bank of the United States; let them reflect on the vast proportion of fixed landed capital, compared with the active money capital of that country; and then let them ask themselves, whether any people on earth will or can reasonably be expected to abide with patience the sale of their property, of their very dwellings, under the hammer of the auctioneer, when, for want of a sound currency, it must be sacrificed, in order to pay debts due to the Bank of the United States, in which their direct interest as stockholders is comparatively trivial? Whether it be not unwise and cruel to put the patriotism of any people to such a test, events rapidly approaching may serve to show. The love of the Union is founded on a just sense of its advantages to all; the loyalty of a free people to Government is, as it ought to be, founded in a perception of its blessings, and must cease when it becomes a curse. I might look to other parts of the Union which present the danger under a different aspect; but I will not pursue the subject, which, indeed, I was loath to touch. If the alternative shall be presented, whether the charter of the bank shall not be renewed because it is unconstitutional, or the Union, and, with it, of course, the whole constitution, shall be put in jeopardy, the people will weigh the subject with anxious care and deliberation.

If it please God to spare me life, and the possession of my faculties, the people of Virginia shall understand all the alternatives likely to be presented to them. They must decide. When the question shall be, whether a vital and permanent change shall be wrought in the fundamental principles of our institutions; whether, in effect, any thing shall be done or omitted, the doing or omission of which shall lead to revolution; the determination shall not rest on my sole responsibility; it shall rest on that of the sovereign State to which I belong. As a citizen, I may advise, dissuade, oppose; but, in the end, I shall not be able to disavow myself from her. I follow her destinies; I stand by her in all events.

But, sir, the question concerning the renewal of the charter of the Bank of the United States is, or rather it would have been, if the bank had been permitted quietly to expire without any violation of faith or of law, so comparatively indifferent to me, that it has been with some difficulty that I have, on this occasion, brought my mind to the consideration of it. I should have been willing to see the institution go down, content to see the nation struggling under any degree of inconvenience, and enduring any endurable state of want, making any sacrifice of property; but I cannot consent to the least sacrifice of civil liberty. We see the President openly assuming the power to dispose of the public treasure, at his pleasure, and by his independent power—lending it through the instrumentality of the Secretary of the Treasury, by half millions at a time, without any appropriation by law, to favored State banks, avowedly for the purpose of enabling them to pay their own debts out of it, and to trade on the surplus for their own profit. And if he may lend it to a body corporate, why not to a natural person? There is no conceivable distinction in principle. We see him at the same time, through the instrumentality of his Postmaster General, borrowing money at six per cent. interest, without pretence of any authority of law, and in contempt of an express provision of the constitution vesting such power in Congress. We see him taking away the public deposits from the Bank of the United States, on allegations of misconduct, nowise affecting its fiscal agency, which he must know to be matters of judicial cognizance, since he declares that he would have ordered a scire facias against the bank, but for the short time its charter had to run. Our most essential liberties are seized into his hands; the principal features that distinguish our republican system are obliterated by the exertion of an assumed and hitherto unheard of prerogative; and the President proclaims to the world that neither the opinions of the people nor the voice of the legislature shall alter his course of measures. The constitution is falling in ruins around us. Shall we sit here deliberating whether the charter of the bank shall be renewed or not? Of what avail are our deliberations? I would by no means be wanting in courtesy towards the gentleman from Massachusetts, but, for my part, I shall hardly be willing even to consider the question of the renewal of the bank charter, till the just authority of the legislature, and the vital principles of liberty, shall be vindicated and secured against all assaults. Our forefathers of the revolution resisted a principle, which, if admitted, might lead to oppression; they did not wait till actual oppression was felt; the stamp act and the duties on tea were not enforced. They revolted against the assertion of power by the British Parliament, to bind the colonies in all cases whatever. Here, the most palpably unconstitutional prerogatives are not only claimed by the President, but exercised and persisted in, and if he shall succeed in establishing them, the precedent will be decisive and fatal. The influence of such a precedent may be estimated by the use which has been made of the example set by Mr. Crawford, while the administration of the Treasury Department was in his hands. That gentleman was not appointed to succeed another officer displaced for refusing, in the exercise of a discretion confided to him, to withdraw the public deposits from the Bank of the United States at the President's bidding; so that, at once, the only question which his conduct presented, was a question upon the construction of the charter of the bank, as to the reasons for which the Secretary might withdraw the deposits. Neither did he withdraw any money from the bank which had been deposited there; he only omitted to transfer to it moneys which had been previously deposited in some of the State banks; consisting of balances of which the Bank of the United States was as unwilling to receive as he was to make, the transfer; and the transaction was of so little consideration in his mind, that he forgot to report the proceeding and the reasons of it to Congress; neither was it ever approved or sanctioned. I am most willing to acknowledge Mr. Crawford's title to respect; but I must say that, considering the circumstances, neither his example nor his opinion on that occasion, can have any manner of authority to justify or excuse the recent measures of the Executive. Yet this precedent has furnished the defenders of the Executive their most imposing argument!

Sir, the contest is between the constitutional principles of the republican Government and the principles of monarchy. It were unnecessary and idle to inquire whether the President designs to subvert the constitution? Political causes put into action often produce effects beside, beyond, and contrary to the purposes of the actors. When the English Parliament consented to purge the army, did it do so with design to make Cromwell lord protector of England? When Bonaparte usurped the crown of Spain, did he design to subvert his imperial throne? And yet it was that act of all-grasping ambition, that fatal "blunder," which roused the spirit of resistance in the nations of Europe, that accomplished his downfall.

The recent disclosures have convinced me, that a broader metallic basis than now exists is absolutely necessary to sustain our extended system of bank credit and bank paper currency; and I can readily see that this may be partially effected by State or Federal legislation—wise, judicious legislation; but I must protest against the power of the President to accomplish such an object, however desirable. I make the remark, because the President told one of those committees that recently waited on him with memorials, that he meant to restore a metallic medium of circulation to the country; and that, in order to do this, he proposed, first, to stop the circulation of all notes under ten dollars, by placing the public deposits in such State banks as would issue no notes below that denomination, and by prohibiting the receipt, in payment of the revenue, of the notes of such banks as should issue smaller notes; and that afterwards, a like process would be employed to put out of circulation all bank notes under the denomination of twenty dollars. That he should think the Executive power competent to adopt and enforce such a system of policy, could excite no man's surprise. But what I am going to mention is very remarkable, and it is equally remarkable that it has not hitherto attracted the least notice. The President being asked when he intended to commence the execution of his plan, answered, not till after the expiration of the charter of the Bank of the United States. (I am only stating the substance of what he said from memory.) Now, I wish to have it observed, that, as the charter of the bank will expire on the 1st March, 1836, and the President's term of office on the 4th March 1837, either he designs to accomplish this difficult operation of restoring a metallic medium of circulation within the short space of one year, or he intends to be re-elected for a third term, and perhaps for another term after that; for the probable duration of his life will hardly be equal to such a work. I do not affirm that such are his designs; but he has taught me to note his words, and to compare his subsequent conduct with them. His words are often portentous. We have no light by which we can discern the issue of the present state of things, but that which coruscates from his mansion; and that is like flashes of lightning in a dark night, serving only to show us precipices, dangers, and horrors all around us, but no road by which we can hope to extricate ourselves from them. Must the earth quake—must the earth quake, before the people cease to sleep?

[The following is the Bill which Mr. WEBSTER asked leave to introduce.]

A bill to continue, for the term of six years, the act entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States."

Be it enacted, &c., That the act entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States," approved on the tenth day of April, in the year one thousand eight hundred and sixteen, shall continue in full force and effect for the term of six years from and after the period therein limited for its expiration, to wit, the third day of March, in the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six; and that all the rights, interests, properties, powers, and privileges secured by the same act, with all the rules, conditions, restrictions, and duties therein prescribed and imposed, be and remain after the said third day of March, in the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, during the said six years, as if the said limitation in the said act had not been made: Provided, nevertheless, That so much of the said act as declares that no other bank shall be established by any future law of the United States, during the continuance of the corporation thereby created, shall not be continued by this act; but that it shall be lawful for Congress, whenever it shall see fit, to establish any other bank to come into existence and operation at any time on or after the fourth day of March, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That all public moneys accruing to the United States, and becoming payable from and after the passage of this act, in places where the said bank or any of its offices is established, shall be deposited in the Bank of the United States and its offices as heretofore: Provided, That, at any time after this act shall have been accepted, Congress may, by law or joint resolution, cause such moneys to be withdrawn and removed to any other custody or place of deposit.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That, in consideration of the benefits and privileges conferred by this act, the said bank shall pay to the United States the annuity or yearly sum of two hundred thousand dollars, which said sum shall be paid, by the said bank, on the fourth day of March, in each and every year, during the said term of six years.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That Congress may provide, by law, that the said bank shall be restrained, at any time after the third day of March, in the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, from making, issuing, or keeping in circulation any notes or bills of said bank, or any of its offices, of a less sum or denomination than twenty dollars.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That, at any time or times within the last three years of the existence of said corporation, as continued by this act, it shall be lawful for the president and directors to divide among the several stockholders thereof such portions of the capital stock of said corporation as they may have withdrawn from active use, and may judge proper so to divide.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That so much of any act or acts of Congress, heretofore passed and now in force, supplementary to, or in anywise connected with, the said original act of incorporation, approved on the tenth day of April, in the year one thousand eight hundred and sixteen, as is not inconsistent with this act, shall be continued in full force and effect during the said six years, after the third day of March, in the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the president and directors of the said bank, on or before the first day of the next session of Congress, to signify to the President of the United States their acceptance, on behalf of the Bank of the United States, of the terms and conditions in this act contained; and if they shall fail to do so on or before the day above mentioned, then this act shall cease to be in force.

Before the question of leave was taken,

Mr. WRIGHT obtained the floor, and intimated his wish to address the Senate on the subject; when, on his motion,

The Senate adjourned.

PUBLIC DISTRESS.

Mr. TOMLINSON rose and presented the memorial of the merchants, manufacturers, and other citizens of the town of Bridgeport, in Connecticut, relative to the embarrassments and distress consequent on the course of the Executive respecting the currency and banking institutions in the country.

With the memorial, Mr. T. said, he had received a communication from several respectable citizens of that town, authorizing him to state that the memorial is subscribed by 380 persons, who are entitled to vote at the town and State elections; and that there are but a few more than 400 legal voters residing in the town.

As Bridgeport, said Mr. T., is situated in the western section of Connecticut, and in the county of my birth and residence, I have the satisfaction of personally knowing many of the memorialists, and of being able, on this occasion, to bear unequivocal testimony to the respectability of their standing, as intelligent, practical, and candid men, who cannot be suspected of misrepresentation for sinister or party purposes. The language of the memorial, said Mr. T., is respectful but strong, conveying sentiments and feelings worthy of independent freemen, who know their rights and interests, and will maintain them. Disclaiming all intention to impugn or discuss the conduct of the Executive, the memorialists earnestly invoke the attention of Congress to the disastrous consequences which have followed that conduct, and the ruin which it threatens to bring on the country, by embarrassing the agricultural, manufacturing, mechanic, and commercial interests; depriving labor of its accustomed and rightful reward, and greatly augmenting the profits and power of capitalists, to the serious detriment of the laboring classes in the community.

For the information of the Senate, it may not be improper, said he, to state, that, notwithstanding the fluctuations of trade heretofore, Bridgeport has steadily and rapidly advanced in wealth and improvement. At the commencement of the present century, it was comparatively but an inconsiderable village. Now, the borough of that name exceeds in population any other port in that important and populous section of the State. It not only participates largely in the trade and business of the productive and rich county of Fairfield, but extends its commercial relations into the very important and prosperous counties adjoining it.

Among the memorialists are many respectable mechanics, whose wealth and respectability are the result of their own intellectual and moral energies. Indeed, to their extraordinary enterprise, industry, and economy, may be chiefly attributed the great and acknowledged success which has attended the people of that place in the prosecution of the mechanic arts.

There are, in that borough, two banks in operation, with considerable capitals. One of them existed before the charter of the first Bank of the United States expired, and maintained its credit by regularly redeeming its bills during the disastrous period when coin was driven from circulation by an inundation of the depreciated paper of the State banks which had violated their engagements to the public by the suspension of specie payments. But, sir, in the present state of distrust and consternation, these banks do not, and undoubtedly cannot, furnish aid adequate to the emergencies of the active and useful business-men who have become, in a measure, dependent upon their facilities, under the system of credit so universally established in our country.

The usual, expected, and necessary accommodations of those institutions being withheld, the business of many is greatly embarrassed, and the profits of more safe and prosperous times may be sacrificed by persevering efforts to sustain well-earned and valued reputations for punctuality and integrity. Under such circumstances, extensive sales are not and cannot be made, either for cash or on credit. Exchanges, and the transportation of merchandise coastwise, must consequently be diminished. As the memorialists, and the merchants and ship owners in the several ports embraced within the limits of the district of Fairfield, employ a large amount of tonnage and capital in the coasting trade, any considerable diminution or embarrassment of that great and essential interest, must there be severely felt and justly deprecated.

In the spirit of enterprise for which they are so justly distinguished, the citizens of Bridgeport, within the last year, have likewise organized a chartered company, for the purpose of pursuing the whaling business, with a large capital, and have already commenced extensive operations. The memorialists cannot regard, without deep solicitude, the existing danger, that an undertaking so intimately connected with the prosperity of their borough, may be suspended, and ultimately prostrated, by an unwise and rash experiment on the moneyed relations and institutions of the country. Nor can the useful and working men there, whose industry, and labor, and ingenuity, have been, and are, fostered and sustained, to a considerable extent, by borrowed capital, view, without alarm, any movement of the constituted authorities of the country, calculated to carry into effect the declaration, that men who do business on credit ought to break. On the contrary, they remonstrate against the continuance of an experiment daily producing such appalling consequences. Depressed and desponding under the withering influence of an Executive measure, which has not only deranged our currency and impaired mercantile confidence, but arrested the business, disappointed the hopes, and threatens to complete the ruin of multitudes of industrious and useful citizens, the memorialists appeal to Congress, in full confidence that their representations will meet the deliberate and wise and effective consideration demanded by the existing crisis.

In conclusion, Mr. T. moved, that, after being read, the memorial be referred to the Committee on Finance and printed; which was ordered.

PHILADELPHIA MECHANICS' MEMORIAL.

Mr. M'KEAN said, a committee of sixteen gentlemen, mechanics of Philadelphia, consisting of cabinet-makers, piano forte-makers, chair-makers, upholsterers, fancy furnishers, fringe-makers, carvers, gilders, varnishers, turners, lamp-makers, coach-makers, and others engaged in furnishing materials for the same, have charged me with a memorial, to be presented to the Senate, signed, as I am informed, by about seven hundred of these meritorious citizens. They state that they have been steadily pursuing their various occupations, and endeavoring to fulfil their duties as mechanics and citizens, without interfering in political affairs further than simply exercising their rights at the polls; and that, up to the period of the removal of the public deposits from the United States Bank, their various branches of business were becoming increasingly prosperous; they were thankfully enjoying the fruits of honest industry, and indulging a prospect of their continued increase. But, since the event alluded to, they have experienced an almost total prostration of their business, which, if not averted soon, must involve them and their families in utter ruin; and that they can ascribe their present distress to no other cause than the removal of the deposits, and earnestly request their immediate restoration. Sir, said Mr. K., I have had personal intercourse with all the members of this committee, and it is my duty and my pleasure to say, that they evince much respectability of character, candor, and intelligence. I have listened to their tales of distress, and I cannot, I dare not, doubt their truth; and, if I possessed the power, it should be exerted for their relief; but I fear, if what they ask (the restoration of the deposits) were granted, it would be found wholly inadequate. Sir, these memorialists also held a public meeting, the proceedings of which I am also requested to lay before the Senate. They accord, generally, with the views expressed in the memorial, in reference to the causes and effects of pecuniary distress and derangement of the currency; and I regret to say, in my opinion, they have indulged in unnecessarily harsh language, in alluding to the present Chief Magistrate of the Union and the State of Pennsylvania, more especially toward the latter. Neither of those distinguished men could be benefited by my feeble defence. The lofty character of the first carries with it a sure antidote against the poison of calumny. As respects the present Chief Magistrate of Pennsylvania, I have had the honor of a long and intimate acquaintance with that excellent man, than whom there is not a more single-minded and pure statesman living.

The memorial and proceedings were then read, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

NEW ORLEANS MEMORIAL.

Mr. WAGGAMAN presented resolutions and a memorial adopted at a meeting of the merchants of New Orleans, complaining of the distress which had fallen on them, and attributing this distress to the removal of the deposits, &c. On the presentation of which, Mr. W. addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. President: I hold in my hand a document containing sundry resolutions and a memorial, adopted at one of the largest public meetings ever convened in New Orleans, on any preceding occasion, which it becomes my duty, as the co-representative of Louisiana on this floor, to communicate to the Senate. And I will also take leave to observe, though it may be disagreeable to the ears of some gentlemen, that that meeting was composed of every description of persons, without distinction as to party, Jackson men and anti-Jackson men, administration and anti-administration men, supporters and opponents of the present administration. The proceedings had at that meeting were signed by its chairman, Mr. Oakley, who has been, from the earliest period of the aspirations of the present Chief Magistrate for political power and high official station, down to the present moment, through good and through evil report, one of his most ardent, active, and zealous friends, spending more money, and consuming more time in aid of the cause, than any other man known to me in that State. Sir, I say it in no term of reproach to that gentleman, but am happy to avail myself of this public occasion to bear testimony in favor of his most excellent character, believing, as I do, that whatever he has done in partisan acts in aid of this administration, has been done with the purest and most patriotic motives. I have thought it proper to be thus minute and circumstantial, in order to show that the meeting was not devised and got up in aid of party views and party purposes, but wholly and exclusively for the intents and purposes set forth in the memorial.

These resolutions and memorial state facts that no declarations, however bold and reckless, can deny; nor arguments, however eloquent, ingenious, and artfully woven, can weaken. It states the deep and abiding distress of the people, I mean the agricultural and commercial people of Louisiana, who, notwithstanding their heretofore successful enterprise, have not, in this dark hour of pecuniary distress and want, been able to shield themselves from its ruinous consequences. Their rich and fertile lands, aided as they have been by the hands of their skilful and industrious cultivators, have in vain yielded forth their accustomed rich fruits and abundant harvests; they remain without demand, or are sold at prices far and ruinously below the reasonable and just expectations of those, by the sweat of whose brows, and the toil of whose hands, they have been produced.

My honorable friend from Georgia, [Mr. FORRESTH,] some days ago, took occasion to remark, that he did not believe those distresses, so loudly complained of at the North, had extended to or were felt at the South; and congratulated the whole South on the prosperity of that portion of it included in the limits of the State so ably and so honorably represented by him. Without in the least pretending to a knowledge of the affairs of that State, at all comparable to that possessed by the honorable gentleman, I much fear that when Georgia shall inquire into her situation, and calculate the true value of her real estate, the price of her products, and the value of her stocks, she will find herself in a situation very little better than that which Louisiana has the misfortune to be placed in. And then, sir, if that be a fit occasion and a meet subject for gratulation, I know not when, where, or to whom, in the day of our deep distress, we are to look for sympathy and condolence.

This memorial sets forth, that the quantity of cotton sold and now on sale in New Orleans, being the crop of the present year, amounts to five hundred thousand bales. Taking the maximum of the price at which the market opened in September last, and the maximum of the price on the 20th of February past, and the difference between the two prices will be the sum that has been lost to the growers of that article, amounting to the enormous sum of $4,000,000.

The bank stocks of Louisiana, heretofore among the most valuable in the United States, whether considered in regard to the largeness of the dividend yielded by them, or their value and demand in the market, have, within the last sixty days, fallen twenty per centum. Calculating the diminished value of the stock at what it really is, twenty per cent. on the whole banking capital of Louisiana, which is largely over $20,000,000, and the loss on that description of property will be found to exceed $4,000,000. The loss on twenty thousand hogsheads of sugar, the amount of the crop of the present year, will amount, according to the most moderate computation, to the enormous sum of $1,500,000—enormous, when it is taken into consideration that that loss has to be borne, as best it may, by a very small number of persons, a very few being in the cultivation of the cane and the manufacture of sugar, in comparison with the great number engaged in other and different agricultural pursuits. These three items alone, of cotton, sugar, and bank stocks, without reference to the very great depreciation that has taken place in the value and price of real estate, will amount to the immense sum of $9,500,000.

The loss of this enormous, and almost incredible sum, is to be participated in, and borne, by a part of Tennessee, Mississippi, Louisiana, and a very small part of Alabama, much the largest proportion of which falls to the unfortunate lot of Louisiana.

I will not, Mr. President, unnecessarily seek to swell and magnify this great sum of pecuniary distress and misery, by a reference to the more than probable consequences of this pernicious Executive policy upon the industry and enterprise of the Great West, as it has been most aptly called by the honorable gentleman from Missouri, and her various productions, that must eventually find a market in New Orleans.

I will not venture or attempt to compute the amount of the diminished value on her 40,000 hogsheads of tobacco, her 180,000 barrels of flour, and her 120,000 barrels of pork, and her almost innumerable other productions, the result of the industry and enterprise of that heretofore happy and prosperous country, much too tedious for me to detail. But, sir, I put nothing of truth or probity at hazard, when here, in my Senatorial place, I assert, that the loss experienced this year, occasioned, as I before God and my country believe, by the present Executive policy of the Government, in the great valley of the Mississippi, inclusive of Louisiana and a very small part of Alabama, will amount to the sum of $13,000,000.

Thirteen millions of dollars have been abstracted from the hard earnings of our industrious fellow-citizens, and so utterly annihilated as to put it beyond the wit and ingenuity of man to restore or reproduce them.

Four short months have scarcely elapsed, and all there was peace and anticipated prosperity. The industrious agriculturist had garnered in the rich fruits of his land, and was, under the smiles of a beneficent and kind Providence, anticipating an ample and just reward for all his anxious cares and labors: the means of providing for the subsistence of those whom nature or accident had rendered dependent on his care and his bounty were obtained. The merchant too, was looking out with eager hope to the speedy and almost certain realization of his well-devised schemes of speculation, based on the experience acquired by a long course of honest trade and successful enterprise. In the too sanguine hope of the future, he saw, or thought he saw, a security for the happy independence of those who made his happy home the home of his heart—the centre around which all the finer and purer affections of his nature were entwined. The industrious day-laborer and the plodding artisan, with hearts full of object and hands full of employment, were spurred forward and animated to increased and renewed exertion in the pursuit of their accustomed and daily avocations.

But how suddenly and how darkly has this serene sky been overcast! How fatally has this fair field of light and of life and of hope been blighted by the pestilent influence of misguided and ill-advised Executive policy and political experiment!

The industrious agriculturist no longer looks with pride and hope on those fair and fertile fields, so lately the source of happiness and prospective independence—they no longer look to him the gilded promise of future support and fortune—they but now remind him of ruined hope and blighted expectation—they only serve to recall to his too prompt recollection, debts unliquidated, obligations unredeemed, and that he must shortly go forth from them a homeless and a houseless wanderer; while they are transferred to some heartless creditor, to satisfy those demands with which no want of foresight and of prudence on his part encumbered them.

The enterprising merchant who but now was surrounded by every thing that was calculated to make his home happy to his heart and pleasant to his eye, is driven from it to become the tenant of a jail, to breathe the damp vapor of a prison, with no companions save bankruptcy and ruin, desolation and blighted hope.

And for what, sir, I ask, for what has this great amount of suffering and distress been created; and why have those vast sums of money been taken from their just and rightful possessors? Has it been done to aid and succor the republic in the hour of her utmost need—in the day of her deep distress? or has it been required at our hands to render more sure and permanent that guarantee of our liberties, that glorious charter of our rights, bequeathed to us by our patriot ancestors, the richest legacy that virtue and patriotism could devise? or has it been employed to repel a dangerous and threatening foreign levy, or to quell domestic strife and fierce civil commotion? No, sir, neither of those three great and legitimate objects of national sacrifice is the cause of our present distress. Its origin must be looked for and found in a much less consoling, in a much less patriotic cause—in an experiment made, and still further to be made, upon the currency of the country, and the servile forbearance of those whom that experiment will affect.

Was it not enough for those, whom the overweening confidence of a too credulous and a too grateful people appointed to the guardianship of our liberties and our laws, our morals and our fortunes, that we were in the direct road to successful experiment—that we were prosperous beyond all precedent and contemporaneous example—that, in fine, we were happy and contented; but we must be made more happy, more prosperous, and, if possible, more contented; and, if either, or all of these three great promised boons fail, the experiment is still to be persisted in, and pertinaciously pursued. And for what, sir? For the happiness and good of the people of the United States? No, sir, not at all; but for the honor, glory, and pride of him, who boasts consistency, no matter what its tendency may be, whether to good or evil, to happiness or misery, to the building up or the pulling down the fortunes of those who will too surely be the victims of this fatal experiment.

Sir, it cannot be, that this nation will remain patient and forbearing in the state it is now brought to. That it will remain serene, tranquil, and compliant, is to suppose man not only destitute of every principle of patriotism, but devoid of every thing like self-consideration, looking with equal unconcern upon good and evil, upon his happiness or his misery. This indeed would be counting upon his possessing a faculty very far above, or very far below, the nature of finite and fallible man.

It is in vain that we sit here in deliberation, and speculating upon the cause or causes that have led to the misery and distress that now pervade this land, from its extreme northern boundary to its utmost southwestern limit. It is wholly immaterial whether it be attributable to the removal of the deposits and the coercive measures adopted by the Bank of the United States in consequence of such removal, or that those coercive measures were gratuitous and uncalled for, as regards the degree and extent of the suffering and distress occasioned by the act.

We have been told, and on my conscience I believe truly told, that the present unexampled distress of the country has been brought upon us by the policy of the Executive branch of the Government, in changing the fiscal agents through and by which the monetary transactions of the country have heretofore been so faithfully and so beneficially executed, and the numerous consequences incident to such a change. If, sir, this fact be denied, in justification of my opinion I refer to the testimony of the 50,000 witnesses whose names are spread upon your table, whose character for probity and honor have been vouched for by many honorable Senators on this floor, and by public opinion every where.

New Orleans Memorial.

[MARCH 19, 1834]

In civil transactions, if I do not err in my recollection of the law of evidence, the testimony of a single credible and competent witness, concurrently with strong presumptive circumstances, is taken and considered, judicially, as conclusive of the fact. If, then, one such witness be accounted sufficient in judicial matters, how then can we decline to yield our credence to 50,000 witnesses of equally legal and moral competency.

Our respect, I fear, for that testimony is lessened, and our ears are becoming fatigued and insensible to the complaints and remonstrances of our fellow-citizens, in consequence of the frequency with which they are made; but, rely upon it, sir, they will not be the less frequently urged upon us on that account, or diminished because of the obtuseness of the intellect to which they are addressed. It was aptly said, the other day, by my honorable friend from Kentucky, [MR. CLAY,] that we were in a state of revolution—and it is so: as yet, not marked by the blood-stained hand of the murderer, the footsteps of the midnight incendiary, the sack of our cities, the conflagration of ruined towns and smoking villages, but still we are in the midst of a revolution; and I, for one, thank my God that it is so. It is a revolution in public opinion, spreading far and wide over this devoted land, carrying chilling fear and wild dismay to the hearts of those who have caused it by the abuse of a public trust committed to their administration for the public good. There is not a mail that arrives in this city, that does not bring to us evidence of the fact; there is not a breeze that blows through these halls but is fraught with the cries and groans of the distressed; and whether those cries be senseless cries, and those groans the evidence of the agony of some expiring and hopeless sinner, or the cries and groans of great pecuniary distress and pinching want, a short, a very short time will develop.

Sir, that benumbing and lethargic slumber into which the people were thrown by their too grateful and too indulgent confidence, is gone off. They are awake. They have awakened from the deep and fatal illusion. The lion has been suddenly aroused from his lair; the Douglas has been bearded in his hall: and, depend on it, sir, that you will not be able to put down the one, or argue the other into tame and quiet submission. Sir, unless this wretched, this ruinous policy is changed, speedily changed, all, all the devisers and actors in it will, in all time to come, receive the merited scorn of those who will come after us, as they will certainly receive, and are now receiving, the curses, loud and deep, of those whose fortunes they have overthrown, whose fair prospects and flattering hopes they have so cruelly blighted.

Sir, for the present, I shall forbear any further remarks on this vexatious and much debated subject, but will crave the indulgence of the Senate to read one or two extracts from letters received very recently from two valued friends and intelligent correspondents. The first is from one of the most extensive and skilful merchants in the city of New Orleans, whose character for probity, honor, and intelligence, is not exceeded by any man, any where. Mr. W. then read the following:

"NEW ORLEANS, February 7, 1834.

"Hon. G. A. WAGGAMAN, Washington:

"Dear Sir: We have all been most anxiously looking to Washington, day after day and week after week, in hopes that Congress, by some prompt and decisive measures, would relieve us from the present embarrassing situation in which we are placed by the removal of the deposits, and the consequent measures of the Bank of the United States, but I begin to despair that any thing will be done until it is too late, as the evil is daily increasing, and will soon be beyond the power of Congress to remedy. The pressure in our money market is pretty severe, but, so far as I can learn, is not by any means equal to what exists in the northern cities; and were it nothing but the scarcity of money here that we had to contend with, we could and would soon remedy that in the natural course of business, but unfortunately we are directly affected by the situation of affairs at the North, in the suspension of orders for our produce, the refusal of the northern houses to grant the usual facilities in consequence of the difficulties of negotiating, and their declining even to receive consignments of produce when advances are required, even where those advances are made in drafts of sixty or ninety days! This is the state of affairs, without precedent in my recollection, and you can form no idea how it has paralyzed our commercial operations this season, and what severe losses it has occasioned to this quarter, not only by the depression of the prices of our staples, but in various other obvious ways. The Bank of the United States had recently recommenced the purchase of bills on England, which they took at par, (the mere circumstance of bills on London being at par speaks volumes,) but have within a few days again ceased, and it only now requires that they should refuse buying bills on the North, (and which I daily fear may be the case,) to cap the climax of our troubles. Such a step would prostrate every thing, and I really believe it would cause cotton, sugar, and, indeed, all produce on sale here, to decline 25 per cent. below the present rates. The State banks (which it was so confidently boasted, could supply the place of the Bank of the United States) are not one of them in a situation to take one dollar of exchange on the North, and the only outlet for which is the branch bank, which buys 100 a $150,000 daily; and, if that amount of supply was cut off from our merchants, what possible means could they substitute to make purchases or raise money? On the Western States, the bank does not buy, except under peculiar circumstances, and the consequence is, that bills on Louisville, at sixty days, can be bought at 6 a 7 per cent. discount. The bank rate, when they bought, was 2 per cent. Who pays the difference of 5 per cent.? Of course the community—the farmers and purchasers of western produce pay it into the pockets of brokers; and these farmers of Ohio, &c., are the ones who cry "Hurrah for Jackson!" and "Down with the bank!" If ever an institution deserved the name of the "People's bank," it is the present Bank of the United States. It is they who will suffer by its destruction, and the wealthy men who will gain by it. If the thing could be accomplished without a total derangement of the currency, I should say, let this charter expire and create a new bank, as I confess that I never could see that the present stockholders have any peculiar claim to have five, six, or ten millions of dollars put into their pockets by a renewal. It is, however, on the score of the distress and ruin that would follow any other plan, that I so strongly wish a renewal of this charter; but, if this cannot be accomplished, and I presume it cannot, while king Andrew reigns, how would it answer to extend the charter two or three years, Congress to resume the right of creating a new bank, to go into operation in 1836, and thus, for the two or three years that the present charter was extended, both institutions should be in operation together, and one gradually taking the place of the other, so that the transfer of the business and the winding up of the present bank be made without that shock which must otherwise occur? All parties, I believe, agree that we must have a bank of the United States, and if any one now says that we can get along safely without a national institution, the sooner his head is shaved and he is sent to a lunatic asylum the better. As regards the conduct of the bank here, I do not think they are open to censure. As to the extent of their accommodation, they have four millions under discount, and do not intend to reduce lower than that sum, and which is a full share for New Orleans; besides which, they have nearly or quite as much in domestic exchange bought from our merchants, and which they continue to take freely at fair rates."

"There is no doubt but that the refusal of the branch to deal in Western exchange has caused more or less inconvenience here; but I have not spoken with any one here (except one or two red-hot politicians, whose judgment is so warped that they are hardly compos mentis) who pretends to say that the bank could do otherwise than they have done, and no one pretends to assert that the branch here is the cause of the present distress: it arises from various causes, but principally from the state of affairs at the North—and what the latter arises from, I leave you, who are upon the spot, to decide."

"NEW ORLEANS, February 18, 1834.

"Hon. GEO. A. WAGGAMAN, Washington:

"Dear Sir: I dread the commencement of failures, for if once they begin, I fear it will soon be no disgrace to stop payment, as it will become so general.

"Several of our banks have their checks on Philadelphia and New York coming back under protest, with 10 per cent. damages. The Girard Bank, in the very face of their agreement with the City Bank, have dishonored upwards of 21,000 dollars of the latter's checks, and write, as an excuse, that the Government deposits, and the expected drafts of the Treasury, have been the means of hampering them so much, that they have been obliged to refuse all the facilities they had promised to their correspondents! Treasury funds already hampering them! What will they say when the Bank of the United States refuses to receive their branch notes, and they (the pet banks) are thus obliged to collect the revenue in uncurrent paper, and pay out good money upon the Government checks upon them?"

"NEW ORLEANS, February 26, 1834.

"G. A. WAGGAMAN:

"Dear Sir: I have nothing new to communicate except that the greatest distress pervades every part of the community. Men, who are perfectly solvent, are daily protested, and, unless something is done, and that speedily, the whole country will be in a state of bankruptcy. It is known that there is more specie now in the city, than there has been for the last five years, and yet not a bank will discount, nor will the best paper command the ready even at 2½ per cent.

"All eyes are anxiously turned towards Washington (I mean the city) for relief, and trust that it will, ere long, come in a more welcome shape than Mr. Such-a-one's speech on the removal of the deposits."

Mr. W. then moved that the resolutions and memorial be read, printed, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PORTER then rose. I am aware (said he) of the difficulty there is at this late period, of fixing the attention of the Senate on any particular portion of the community who appeal to it for relief. We are so constituted by nature, that objects which strike the mind vividly, when first presented, lose nearly all power of affecting us, by frequent repetition. The fairest prospect which nature offers to the eye ceases to charm the observer who looks upon it every day of his life. Continued appeals to our sympathy destroy the effect the first claim on it produced, and end by making us comparatively indifferent to the objects by which these appeals are elicited. So the Senate, who, at the commencement of this session, were struck first with astonishment, and then with dismay, at the numerous memorials which flowed in upon us from all quarters, depicting the distress which pervaded the country, now hears them read, not with perfect indifference—I will not do it the injustice to say so—but certainly with a feeling something approaching to satiety. Day after day, sir, we come to this hall, with an assured conviction that we shall find one or more appeals from the people, containing representations of the pressure in the money market, the distress which is attendant on it, and the ruin which it threatens. The same unvarying tale of woe, scarcely modified by the different circumstances in which the petitioners are placed, continually assails our ears, and falls on them without conveying any distinct image to the mind; until finally we have reached this condition of things, that those who think no relief can be given, are fatigued to hear it asked for; while those who think it can be given, that it ought to be given, but who despair of seeing it given, conclude that the people need not look here, that they must look to home for redress; that they must act through the ballot-box, if they wish to be relieved from the evils of bad government.

Yet, sensible as I am of these disadvantages, I am unwilling to let this memorial be referred, without saying something which may possibly awaken the attention of the Senate to the condition of those who sent it here. In addition to the document which my colleague presented, as emanating from a public meeting, I hold in my hand a memorial, signed by a large number of very respectable persons in New Orleans. The names to it were obtained by carrying it round, and presenting it to those who might be desirous of signing it. And it is proper I should state why two representations so nearly alike should come from the same city at the same time. When that last mentioned was in a course of signature, there were many persons who did not consider it the most eligible mode of ascertaining the sentiments of the people of New Orleans on the great question now agitating this country. They thought, whether correctly or not need not be inquired into, that such a mode was open to the objection of the signers having yielded to the solicitations of those who presented the paper to them. And they particularly objected, because it did not furnish the means by which the strength of the party opposed to the sentiments contained in it could be known. They therefore called a public meeting, at which every one might attend, and give all the effect in his power to the opinions he might entertain. That meeting was held, and its proceedings have been just presented to you by my colleague.

I desire, then, to say, sir, that the memorial which has been offered to you, is entitled to the consideration of this body, because it comes from a very large portion of the population of an industrious, an enlightened, and an eminently commercial city. The Secretary of the meeting, himself a person of great respectability, writes me, that it was the largest public assembly ever witnessed by him in that place, and the other advices which have reached me and my colleague speak of it as most numerously attended. It was composed of all classes and conditions of society, from the merchant whose annual transactions are to be estimated by millions, to the tradesman whose daily labor procures subsistence for himself and family, and it embraced all the intelligence which lies at these extremes, and between them.

It is entitled to consideration, sir, for another reason: It was largely composed of that political party called Jackson men. I make this remark, having fresh in my recollection the censure bestowed by the Senator from Virginia, a few days since, on the habit prevailing here of announcing such a fact on the presentation of a memorial. Sir, I heartily agree with that honorable Senator, that the practice tends somewhat to bring petitioning into disrespect. And so, sir, unfortunately, does party spirit, in all its excesses, tend to weaken, and bring into disrespect, every thing valuable in the institutions we prize so highly. But it is inseparable from them, and we must take men as they are, with their passions and their prejudices, and deal with them as we find them, when we cannot make them better. Now, sir, I observed, for some time after memorials were presented to us on this subject, that the existence of the distress expressed in them was denied, and it was confidently asserted that they were got up for political effect. That tone, it is true, is now changed, but I am afraid there is still a suspicion lurking in the minds of some of my honorable friends on the other side, that political feeling may somewhat tinge the unwelcome complaints they so often hear. When, therefore, we can present them the result of a meeting composed of their own friends, we take from them all pretext for saying that it is the result of prejudice, and got up for political objects. And when composed, as here, of both the political parties, it is of more weight than when composed of either. For if, on the one side, there is "nothing extenuated," we are sure that, on the other, "naught is set down in malice." Then, sir, the Senate must be convinced that it can be no common condition of affairs, but a very uncommon one, which makes men who agree in nothing else, join in the representation that there is great distress in the city, and that it should be represented to Congress.

And, sir, I cannot help thinking that the distress must be pungent and searching, which brings men so opposite in their opinions, on the same ground, and, when there, makes them unite. Had any one, sir, told me when I left New Orleans, that, two months after my departure, an assemblage composed of these two parties would have met there, and requested me to vote for a re-charter of the present bank, I should have given no more credence to the statement than I would have done to a prophecy that, within the same space of time, two of the great sects of christianity had, upon mutual consultation, surrendered their respective opinions, and agreed to a common creed. For, sir, it did so happen, that this very bank question entered into the late election which made me a member of this House, and among my other demerits, it was charged on me, that I was a bank advocate. Indeed, some of my Jackson friends told me that this was the very "head and front of my offending." Now, sir, to find these same persons, within so short a space of time, uniting in a requisition on me to sustain this institution, is a circumstance too remarkable not to excite attention.

I wish, sir, not to be misunderstood. I trust no one believes that I feel any gratification at this change because it is an evidence of the triumph of my opinions; or still less that I mark it as a proof of weakness in the highly intelligent and most respectable individuals who think differently on this subject from what they did some time since. Far, very far from me, is any such thought or purpose. There is nothing I condemn more in others than the odious practice of quoting a man's opinions at one time of his life, and setting them up with a sneer against his later conclusions, in order to prove his want of wisdom or want of integrity; as if a man was never to become wiser; as if the moment when his first opinions were formed was to be that at which he was to stand still, and to cease all improvement for the rest of his life; as if he was forever to shut his eyes against light, because he was once blind. I note the circumstance for a quite different purpose. I draw a very different moral from it. I infer, and I am sure the Senate will coincide with me, that the evil effects which result from the attempt to prevent a re-charter of the United States Bank, must have shown themselves in New Orleans in a most striking and convincing aspect, to have induced this change of opinion. I press on the Senate that there can be no doubt of the force of the evidence which induced these men to abandon their prepossessions, honestly and sincerely entertained, and come to conclusions totally variant from those which they formerly reached on this subject. And, sir, I feel, that if all the people in the United States, who really think as these memorialists now do, and once thought as they did, would only have the same magnanimity to acknowledge their errors, that the country would be soon relieved from the evils under which it at present suffers.

The memorial before you is entitled to great consideration for another reason. It is not offered to you until after the evils produced by the late measures of the Government had been suffered, for a considerable time, without remonstrance or complaint. When men endure long without murmuring, you may be certain, when their cries do at last burst forth, that they are sincere, and wrung from them by the intensity of their sufferings. The mercantile community of New Orleans, sir, is composed principally of emigrants from Europe and our sister States. Men who, originally possessing an ardent and sanguine temper, have been carried far from their native homes, in search of fortune. Persons of this cast of character are not readily discouraged, nor apt to look on the dark side of things. When, therefore, this storm burst on them, their opinions, obedient to their strong hopes, induced them to believe it would soon pass over; and being told, from this and other high places, that it was temporary, they bore the pressure with patience. It was not until the distress became so acute they could bear it no longer—it was not until, to use their own emphatic language, "ruin was impending over them," that they thought of coming here. The Senate may credit me when I say, that this is no hasty measure, taken up on the spur of the occasion. It is the expression of the calm, deliberate convictions of sagacious men, prompted by the strongest of motives to look closely and deeply into the causes which have occasioned so great a change in their prosperity.

And, sir, in addition to these reasons, there is yet another, which exacts an attentive ear to all the statements which this portion of my constituents make to you, though I admit this reason is not peculiar to this memorial, but common to all representations which come from merchants. Let Senators reflect for one moment, and they must feel that the alarm must be great, and the pressure dreadful, when men, whose prosperity is so deeply connected with the maintenance of confidence, come forward and acknowledge that there are causes to impair that confidence. Credit, sir, is the commercial life of men of business, and they never do any thing they can avoid, to impair it. Can it be supposed for one moment, that persons so circumstanced would proclaim to the world that there were reasons to distrust the ability of the community in which they lived, to meet the storm, if they were not impelled by stern necessity to do so? Rely upon it, nothing else could induce them to acknowledge what men of their pursuits above all things desire to conceal.

And, sir, there are reasons which address themselves with peculiar force to Senators representing States which lie in the valley of the Mississippi, to give their aid to forward the objects the memorialists have in view. I pray them to recollect that New Orleans is not alone the capital of one State, but of the whole of that country which is watered by the river on whose banks it is built, and that whatever injures us must affect the whole population of that vast region. There is their market, there they must seek for responsible agents to sell, and there they must find purchasers, if they find them at all. With our commercial community they have heretofore maintained a direct, active, and most profitable intercourse. With the present state of things all this must soon cease; for the distress now pervading our city will as assuredly travel up the river as its waters now flow down to us. There is not a farmer in the States of Ohio, Kentucky, Tennessee, Illinois, Indiana, and Missouri, who will not feel the pressure in New Orleans, in the diminished value of his wheat, corn, pork, and all the other productions which he takes to market; not a merchant residing in those States who will not sympathize with, and be affected by, any check given to our prosperity.

I intended to make other observations, but the remarks of my colleague render them unnecessary, and the hour is already past, which, by the ordinary practice of the Senate, is devoted to the special order of the day.

Mr. FORSYTH said, the reference made to him by his friend from Louisiana, at his side, gave him a fair occasion, for which he had been anxiously looking for several days, to correct an error he had committed about a fortnight since.

Speaking of the condition of the money market of Augusta, Georgia, he had spoken of the prices of stock and produce as at their usual rate, and had mentioned that the Bank of Augusta, with a capital of $600,000, having authority to double it, had sold the extra stock at a profit of twenty per cent. Mr. F. had no information contradictory of this statement, except as to the last particular. The bank had authority to double its capital, but had made no effort to do so. He had been misled by an account of the sales at auction of a portion of the stock of that bank at that rate of advance, and supposed it to be the whole additional stock of the bank, which was sold at twenty per cent. premium. It still bore that premium, according to the last prices current of the city; but no such sale of double the capital stock had occurred.

In speaking of the condition of the Southern States, he had not intended to embrace New Orleans: that State is so identified with the West, that we speak of it as Western or Southwestern. From the character of the business of that city, no doubt the pressure there was great. It was done exclusively on credit and by exchanges. These being deranged, necessarily affected the business of the city. Mr. F. wished to God he had the power to relieve the distress; it would not be of long continuance if he had; yet he could not but hope it was exaggerated. One statement in the memorial gave grounds for this hope. In estimating the loss sustained by the pressure, the memorial, after establishing, no doubt fairly, as the signers of it believed, that it amounted to eight dollars per bale of cotton, they calculate the loss is $4,000,000—five hundred thousand bales being the estimate of the whole crop of cotton of the States of Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, and Tennessee; and here it must be obvious that this calculation is inaccurate. The loss can fall only on the cotton yet in the market on this side the Atlantic. That which was shipped before January last, certainly cannot be properly taken into the calculation. What portion of the crop of the States mentioned had been shipped before January, he could not tell, but this he knew, from the ports of Charleston, Savannah, and New Orleans, between sixty and seventy thousand bales of cotton had been shipped, on the last quarter of the past year, more than there had been during the same period of the preceding year. How it was elsewhere, Mr. F. could not say. In Georgia, the planters, stimulated by the good prices with which the market opened, had hurried their produce into market, an operation in which they had been favored by an unusually fine season. The larger part of their crops being sold early, at good prices, comparatively, they were now easy in their money matters, and were holding the residue of their crops, with a reasonable hope of better prices in a short time.

Having corrected his own errors, he might be pardoned for advertising to those of others. In the course of discussion, some time since, the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. CHAMBERS,] not now in his seat, and the Senator from Maine over the way, [Mr. SPAID,] had spoken of the draw for specie made on the Branch Bank of the United States at Savannah, and had supposed it to be connected with a plan, in connexion with the Government, to injure the credit of the Bank of the United States, or else as a scheme to reduce the price of the stocks in order to enable the house in New York, who was supposed to have made large contracts for delivery at a coming day, to comply with those contracts at a profitable rate. What occurred in this chamber, being, as usual, very roughly reported, had attracted the attention of the house at Augusta by whom the specie had been drawn at Savannah—and he begged permission, in justice to them, to read a letter just received, addressed to his colleague [Mr. KING] and himself:

"At this time of general excitement in the community on money affairs, it is a matter of no small regret to us, to see our names thrust before the public, coupled with a transaction, in itself a 'fair business transaction,' but misrepresented and distorted into every and any shape, to suit the views of partisan politicians. We allude to the draw of specie made by us on the United States Branch Bank in Savannah, in November last. The simple and incontrovertible facts are these: The act of our legislature, prohibiting the circulation of all notes under the denomination of fives, went into operation early in the fall. The sudden withdrawal of over 600,000 dollars of small notes, created a vacuum in our circulation, which had to be supplied, in a great measure, by specie, instantaneously. You are well aware that we have large operations in specie, and perhaps know, that we have, for years past, been in the habit of contracting with banks to supply them. In this instance we were applied to for specie by no less than nine different banks, in the space of eight or ten days. We made such contracts to deliver to these banks the amount they wanted, as we deemed to our interest. We then contracted with Mr. G. B. Lamar, for the freight of the specie from Savannah to Augusta. All this was done before a dollar of specie was drawn.

"When we drew the specie we did not 'offer the bank to take a check on the North in lieu of the silver.' Neither did we ask the bank or cashier 'to permit us to make a special deposit of the specie.' The bank had not silver enough to pay the whole amount, ($334,000,) and begged our clerk to wait until they could send and get $10,000 from one of the local banks, and he did wait. The specie was delivered by us to nine different banks in this State, except 27,700 Spanish dollars, which, being worth 3 or 4 per cent. premium at that time in New York, was shipped to our house at that place. Every dollar employed in the draw was our own. The operation was entirely and exclusively our own. Our New York house knew nothing of the transaction, until it was all over. Not one dollar of the notes with which the draw was made was sent to us from New York, or any other place out of the State. We have never had the first word of correspondence with the Executive, the Government, or any person in the employ of Government, relative to the United States Bank, the draw in question, or any thing connected with it. The only correspondence we ever had with any person connected with the Government, was with the Assistant Postmaster General, and that on business relating to that Department exclusively. Such a thing as political effect was never intended or thought of by us."

The Senate had now information about that strangely represented transaction, from the fountain head. Mr. F. hoped Senators who had made representations, or received impressions, at variance with the statement made, would be satisfied that they had been misled.

Mr. PORTER said, he had no remarks to make upon what had fallen from the honorable Senator from Georgia in relation to the state of things there. That gentleman was, no doubt, better informed than he (Mr. F.) could be, in regard to the condition of his own State. But, while this admission was cheerfully made, he hoped it would be conceded to him that he knew more of the situation of Louisiana, than the honorable Senator did. The opinions of the memorialists were, however, entitled to more weight on this matter, than either the Senator's or his own. They had the means of obtaining correct information, and they were incapable of giving it to others, in a different shape. The honorable Senator had supposed the memorialists had fallen into an error, in estimating the loss which would be sustained on the cotton shipped from New Orleans this year. They had assumed the quantity to be 500,000 bales, and calculated the loss on the whole number received and shipped, while he supposes that a large quantity must have been sold before the depression in the market took place. That a small portion may be in this hypothesis, is, perhaps, true, but that portion is not sufficiently large to make a change in the estimation worthy of noticing. The depression in price took place before the first of January, and, from the lowness of the waters in the autumn and beginning of winter, of many of the rivers which empty into the Mississippi, no considerable quantity of cotton could reach New Orleans before the fall in the price took place.

While up, Mr. P. said he would barely add an observation which he intended to make before he took his seat—it was this: that heavy as the loss was, which the agriculturists of the valley of the Mississippi this year would sustain, it bore, in his opinion, little comparison to the loss that would be suffered by the community in New Orleans, in paying an excessive interest beyond what they would have paid, had this change in the currency not taken place. He would not go into detail, but gentlemen who would consider the difference between six per centum and eighteen or twenty-four, and think of the sums of money required for only one-half of the necessities of a large commercial city, during four or five months, would easily perceive the force and truth of this remark.

The memorial was then read and referred.

RE-CHARTERING BANK UNITED STATES.

The CHAIR then announced the special order of the day, being the unfinished business of yesterday, the bill to continue for a limited time the charter of the Bank of the United States.

Mr. WEBSTER said, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. WRIGHT] had expressed a wish so say something on this subject, and as the Senator from South Carolina also wished to say something on it, he would move to lay the bill on the table, and thus give the other Senator from New York [Mr. TALLMADGE] an opportunity of continuing his remarks on the other special order, the removal of the deposits. He would make this motion now, at the same time giving notice that he would call up the bill at an early hour to-morrow.

The motion was then agreed to.

REMOVAL OF THE DEPOSITES.

The CHAIR then announced the second special order, being the report of the Committee on Finance, and the resolutions offered by Mr. CLAY; when—

Mr. TALLMADGE resumed and concluded his observations commenced last week, in defence of the removal of the deposits, and in vindication of the power exercised by the Executive, as given entire in preceding pages; when,

On motion of Mr. CLAY, the Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, MARCH 20.

RE-CHARTERING BANK UNITED STATES.

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER, the Senate resumed the consideration of his motion for leave to introduce a bill to continue, for a limited time, the charter of the Bank of the United States; when

Mr. WRIGHT rose and said, it was not his purpose to enter into a discussion of the great principles involved in the passage of the bill upon the table. His object in obtaining the floor, upon a former day, had been to reply to some things which had fallen from the honorable Senator from Virginia, [Mr. LEXON,] and to notice a few remarks made by the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance, [Mr. WEBSTER,] when he offered the bill. He must, he said, however, be permitted to congratulate himself that the Senate had now reached what he had, from the commencement of the session, considered the true question before Congress and the country—the question of “bank or no bank;” the question whether the present Bank of the United States should be re-chartered for any period of time, or whether any national bank should be created by the authority of Congress, after the expiration of the charter of the present bank. These questions, he considered, must be involved in the present discussion, and he must be permitted farther to congratulate himself that, as to the constitutional power of Congress to pass the bill now under consideration, or any bill to charter a bank similar to that now existing, the opinions of the honorable Senator from Virginia [Mr. LEXON] and his own perfectly coincided. The honorable Senator did not believe, nor did he himself believe, that Congress possessed any such power, and therefore, so far as their action was concerned, no such bank could exist after the year 1836, when the charter of the present bank will expire by its own limitation. Mr. W. said he would not attempt to repeat the arguments which the honorable Senator had so happily used, in his clear and strong manner, to establish the correctness of their opinions. Any attempt by him to do so might weaken what had been so well and so concisely said by the Senator; but he would detain the Senate to add one view of this subject, which had not been taken by the honorable Senator, and which had struck his mind with great force. Upon all former occasions, when the power of Congress to charter a bank had been under discussion, reference had been made to that clause of the constitution which reads in the following words:

“The Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or office thereof.”

All, Mr. W. said, as he understood, had formerly argued that this necessity must be shown before the power could be inferred, and he had also understood that all had admitted that this constitutional necessity must be a necessity growing out of the wants of the Government and not out of the wants of business; that it must be a necessity arising from the collection, distribution, and disbursement of the public revenues, not out of the wants of the commercial interests, the mercantile interests, the manufacturing interests, or any other branch of labor and enterprise; that it must be a necessity growing out of the wants of the public Treasury and the administration of the finances of the country, and not out of the wants of the individual citizens. What, Mr. President, (said Mr. W.,) have we heard urged as constituting this necessity, in the whole course of this debate, in all the various shapes and forms in which it has been carried on in this body for now about four months? The wants of ordinary business, the demand for capital, the regulation of exchanges, the importance of a uniform paper currency; not the wants of the Treasury. These last, sir, have not been mentioned in the comparison, while the former are made the indisputable evidence that a bank is necessary. Sir, said Mr. W., the wants of the Treasury, and the wants of the Treasury alone, can constitute this constitutional necessity. The wants of business cannot be the legitimate subjects of consideration for those who seek to derive the power to charter a bank from this provision of the constitution. He said he was one of those who did not believe that any power whatever was granted to Congress by this provision, much less the power to charter a bank; but he must believe that those who did infer such a power from it, would, at least, admit the necessity must be such a one as the constitution contemplated, and that the constitution could not have contemplated any other than a necessity connected with the collection, distribution, and disbursement of the revenues of the Government, not the ordinary necessities of trade and exchange. These last were the wants which gentlemen feared the State banks could not supply, though they were willing to engage to collect and distribute the public moneys upon the same terms that the United States Bank had done it. He begged the Senate to look at this view of the case before they permitted a necessity, imaginary or real, unknown to the constitution, to influence their action. But, said Mr. W., the honorable Senator and myself have no difficulties of this sort to contend with. To our minds, it is clear that the power to pass this bill is not granted by the constitution. Having come to this conclusion, the honorable Senator inquires, in his impressive manner, if the present disposition of the public deposits with the State banks is to be continued? Sir, said Mr. W., I will avail myself of a privilege belonging to my countrymen, the Yankees, and answer the gentleman by asking him a question. What disposition will he propose to make of these deposits? What plan will he recommend for their future disposition? We agree that the charter of the Bank of the United States is unconstitutional, and it cannot, therefore, be extended beyond its present limit. I say, that, in the absence of such an institution, the State banks present to the Government the best and most convenient fiscal agents of which the nature of the case is susceptible. I have said, upon a former occasion, and I repeat, that I think them perfectly safe agents. I have said, and I repeat, that I think them fully competent to discharge all the duties required by the Government in the collection and disbursement of the public revenues, fully competent to answer every constitutional necessity of the Treasury. I now say, further, that I am not alarmed at the power which is placed by law in the hands of the President and the Secretary of the Treasury, over these deposits. It is the same power which was placed by Congress in the hands of the first President and first Secretary of the Treasury, at the formation of the Government under the constitution; it is the same power which existed in the hands of those officers from 1789 up to the year 1816, when the charter of the present bank was granted. During all that period, the liberties of the country were not endangered by it; the people were not then taught to believe that the exercise of that power was usurpation or tyranny. No danger was then seen or apprehended, nor were we told that the purse and the sword of the country were united in one hand. Sir, said Mr. W., these laws have undergone no material alteration from the time of the first Congress to the present day, except the alterations made by the provisions of the present bank charter, and these alterations cease to be applicable when the deposits cease to be made with that institution. Where, then, is the ground for all this alarm—all this apprehension for our liberties? Still the honorable Senator expresses, no doubt most sincerely, the greatest apprehension. Will he not, then, tell us what is to be done? Will he not propose what, in his judgment, shall avert the danger he fears? Sir, I wish to be distinctly understood upon this point? I do not contend that these laws may not be beneficially amended, but I merely say that they are just what they have been from the organization of the Government, with the single exception I have before mentioned, contained in the bank charter. If they are bad, alter and amend them. If the powers over the public deposits conferred upon the Executive department are too broad, limit and confine them. No one doubts or questions the power of Congress over the whole matter: no one resists the action of Congress upon it. Surely, then, it does not become us to find fault with the Executive officers of the Government for executing the laws as they are, while we do nothing to modify the law, and make it what we would wish it to be: Our duty, as legislators, is not to point out the defects in the laws merely, but to apply the proper remedies for those defects; to examine the laws as they are, that we may make them what they ought to be; not to spend our time in deploring those defects for which we offer no remedy. Sir, said Mr. W., I have not allowed myself time to make such an examination of the laws of Congress as enables me to say whether any, and what, alterations are required in those relating to the Treasury Department, and the management and disposition of the public deposits. That changes for the better may be made, is more than probable, and I declare myself ready, at any period, to act upon propositions having this for their object, come from what source they may. I am sure, however, gentlemen will see that Congress should discharge its duty, before we are at liberty to complain of the laws as they are. Mr. President, said Mr. W., we all know, and know well, that it is easy to find fault, that it is easy to complain of existing evils, when it may be very difficult to propose remedies which will even suit ourselves, and much more difficult to propose those which will meet the approbation of Congress. I have said that I am not prepared to make propositions, and I venture the prediction to the honorable Senator, that he, and those gentlemen who, with him, are so deeply dissatisfied with the existing law, will find it much more difficult to legislate upon this subject in a safe and proper manner than they now seem to suppose, and that they will find the changes which can be beneficially made in the existing laws, much less extensive than they, by their complaints, would indicate. Still, sir, I repeat, gentlemen should turn their attention to this subject. If we are to have no Bank of the United States, some disposition must be made of the public deposits. I say, place them in the State banks; but if, as the remarks of many honorable Senators would seem to indicate, the State banks are not to be used, they are surely bound to inform us what disposition they intend to make of them. I am aware, Mr. President, that these remarks address themselves less appropriately to those Senators who believe we ought to have a national bank, and propose such an institution as their remedy for the evils of which they complain, than to those who, with the honorable Senator from Virginia and myself, believe that the constitution does not give us the power to charter such a bank, and that, therefore, it is a remedy beyond our reach; but, sir, these are considerations which should address themselves to the serious reflections of all. They are considerations connected with our duties as legislators, and in reference to which it is now most likely we shall be soon called to act.

Mr. W. said the honorable Senator from Virginia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] had told us that the present year might throw new lights upon this subject, and might develop, in his own State at least, a new condition of public feeling in reference to the re-charter of the bank. The State of Virginia, he said, might see that the present bank was to be destroyed merely to make room for another national bank, in a greater degree subject to Executive influence, and located in the city of New York. Well, sir, said Mr. W., what then? Suppose Virginia does so see (which I think she will not,) what can be the effect upon her action? She has pronounced the charter of the present bank unconstitutional, and she must, therefore, be held to have pronounced its re-charter, or the chartering of any similar bank, wherever located, equally unconstitutional. Will she then call upon her representatives here to vote for a law which she declares to be a violation of the constitution, to prevent a change in the location of a national bank? No, sir. With all deference, I say the people of Virginia do not change their constitutional opinions for such reasons, or govern their constitutional action by such motives. She will not give her voice for a bank which she believes to be unconstitutional, to secure its location, or to prevent its location any where.

But, again: the honorable Senator says, the State of Virginia may see that the State banks are to be continued as the fiscal agents of the Treasury, and that, in that event, the control of the exchanges, and, to some extent, of the currency of the country, must pass to the city of New York. He assigns as the grounds of this opinion, that the position of New York, its natural advantages and great capital, have hitherto forced a large portion of the foreign trade of the country to enter at that point; that this will continue to be the course of that trade; and that, therefore, commercial men in all parts of the country must have money current in New York to carry on their operations. Sir, said Mr. W., I neither affirm nor deny the gentleman's positions. But, for the sake of argument, suppose them to be well taken, and does he believe that the State of Virginia will invoke the aid of the legislation of Congress, and that too by the passage of a law which she herself believes to be unconstitutional, to deprive the city of New York of the advantages which nature has given it? to deprive it of the advantages which the enterprise and industry of its citizens have acquired for it? Does the Senator believe it possible that the State of Virginia will call upon her representatives here, or elsewhere, to vote to re-charter a bank which she has solemnly pronounced to be an institution existing in violation of the constitution, for the mere purpose of forcing out of New York the regulation of the exchanges of the country? Sir, the Senator himself does not so intend. He told us, in the course of his remarks, that he rejoiced at the prosperity of every State in the Union, and entertained not the least invidious feeling towards any. It must be, therefore, either that I have misapprehended the force of the remarks of the honorable Senator, or that he did not sufficiently develop his ideas to give us their true bearing. I can never believe, that the State of Virginia will ever seek to do injustice to a sister State; I am sure she will never do what she pronounces a violation of the constitution of the country to effect such an object.

The honorable gentleman proceeds, again, to say that the State of Virginia may see, in the course of this year, that the confederacy cannot sustain the destruction of this bank; that its destruction may involve the dissolution of this Union. He refers to the territorial distribution of the debts due to the bank, and intimates, that much the largest portion of that debt is due from citizens of the Western States; and then, in that impressive language in which every thing reaches us coming from the honorable gentleman, he asks, Will these citizens consent to have their houses sold from them, and themselves and their families reduced to poverty and want, for the sake of the destruction of the bank? It is not my purpose, Mr. President, said Mr. W., to speak of the pecuniary condition of the citizens of the Western States. My information does not enable me so to speak. One thing, however, I do know, sir, and am most happy to be able to say, that no portion of the citizens of this republic have heretofore, and up to this period, been more patriotic, more devoted, more disinterestedly devoted, to the safety and perpetuity of our civil institutions, and to the integrity of our Union, than the citizens of the West; none have more willingly, or more severely suffered, to secure these objects, than they have. I doubt not that the same spirit and patriotism still prevail among them; and while I know not the extent of their indebtedness, or their means of payment, I hope and believe they have not arrived at that state, when the power of a creditor moneyed corporation is paramount with them to their attachment to the constitution and laws of their country. But, sir, the effect upon the action of Virginia is the question I propose to consider. Will that patriotic State instruct her Senators to vote for a law which she has adjudged a violation of the constitution, because the debtors of a bank created by an unconstitutional law, cannot discharge that indebtedness? Will the State of Virginia admit that a bank of the United States, with a charter not authorized by the constitution, and with seventeen years of life only, has the power to destroy the confederacy of the States and dismember the Union, and then, by her own voice and action give that bank further life and further power? I cannot think so, and I am convinced, if the honorable Senator [Mr. LETCHER] reviews the tendency of his remarks and conclusions, and the important results which may follow the decision of the question now before us, he will not, he cannot, feel that indifference as to the action of Congress upon the bill now under consideration to re-charter the bank, which I understood him to express, when giving his sentiments to the Senate.

Mr. W. said, the honorable Senator had, for the second time, alluded to the subject of the transfer drafts, with which he had, upon both occasions, coupled the transactions of the Post Office Department; and in that way he had presented to the Senate, with his characteristic clearness and force, a case of mismanagement of the public funds, which, upon the Senator's first exhibition of it, had perceptibly an effect upon all sides of the House. The Secretary of the Treasury, as the head of one of the Executive Departments of the Government, had been represented as lending money from the public Treasury gratuitously, and without interest, to the State banks, to enable them to sustain themselves; while the Postmaster General had been brought in, upon the other hand, as the head of another of those Executive Departments, borrowing money for the use of the Government, and paying an interest of six per cent. for the loans so made. Upon this presentation of the case, and especially with the vivid coloring which the honorable Senator imparted to it, he, Mr. W., was ready to admit that attention was justly excited. He had therefore taken same pains to inform himself as to the facts, and he would attempt to give them to the Senate in an intelligible form, and leave to the judgment of the body, the degree of blame which should be considered fairly imputable, any where, from the transactions. The first and great error in the gentleman's case, was the connexion of the Post Office with the Treasury Department. If he had taken the trouble to examine the subject, he would have found that the Secretary of the Treasury could no more pay money from the public Treasury to answer the wants of the Post Office Department, without the authority of a law of Congress, than he could pay money for the wants of private business of the honorable Senator or himself. If he had examined the laws of Congress upon the subject, he would have found that no appropriation of money from the public Treasury for the use of the Post Office Department existed, which had not been promptly and fully paid. The idea, therefore, that the Secretary of the Treasury might have taken the money on deposit in the Bank of the United States, to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States, and appropriated it to the wants of the Post Office Department, is fallacious and deceptive. Without a direct and palpable violation of the law, and of his official powers and duties, he could not have made any such disposition of these moneys; and surely, at this time, when the Secretary of the Treasury is so broadly accused of constitutional as well as legal violations, the gentlemen who make the accusations will not be disposed to censure him for not having violated the law in this instance. Mr. W. said he did not intend, by any expression he had made, or might make, to convey the most distant impression that the honorable Senator had designedly conveyed an erroneous impression as to the relations between these two Departments of the Government. Considering both as equally public interests, he had, undoubtedly, omitted to turn his attention to the want of legal authority to make the payments which the import of his remarks went to show ought to have been made from the moneys remaining in the Treasury.

It will be seen, however, said Mr. W., that the imaginary connexion between those two Departments, which gave to the Senator's relation the most point, as an instance of Executive mismanagement, has no legal existence whatever, and, therefore, we have the Post Office Department, and its management and administration, wholly separated from the operations of the Treasury. How, then, stand the loans to the State banks, of which the honorable Senator speaks? On the first of October last, the Secretary of the Treasury came to the conclusion to change the deposit of the public moneys thereafter to be received, from the Bank of the United States and its branches, to various State banks which had been selected by him for that purpose. He was aware, that, in consequence of the deposits having been previously made in the Bank of the United States and its branches, large balances must have accrued in favor of the deposit bank and branches, against the State banks, in the principal commercial cities, because the revenue collected in those cities must have been paid by the whole trading population, who must derive their means of payment from all the banks, while those means applied to those payments, must go into the single bank or branch in which the public moneys were kept. He was further apprehensive that the United States Bank would assume a hostile attitude towards the banks which should consent to receive the deposits of the public moneys in lieu of that institution, and would call for any balances which might exist in its favor against any of those banks, and would require the payment in specie before time would be allowed for the banks to receive any benefit from the deposits. He also knew, that, by a law of Congress, the public revenue was payable in the bills of the Bank of the United States and its branches, while those bills could not be converted into specie, in case the Bank should choose not to redeem them at the points where they should be received, except by causing them to be presented at the bank or office which issued them, or where, upon their face, they might be made payable. He also knew, that, by an order of his Department, a certain description of paper, put into circulation by the bank and its branches, and known by the appellation of "bank drafts," but which, Mr. W. said, he believed the highest court in the country had decided were neither "bills" nor "notes" of the bank, were made receivable in payment of the revenue, which drafts, if the bank should refuse to receive them as money, at the place where taken in payment, could not be converted into specie, or even into bills of the bank, but by presentment at the bank or office upon which they were drawn. The knowledge of these facts showed the Secretary that, should the bank be thus disposed, it could exert a double power of injury against the State institutions which were to take the deposits, by instantly calling for the payment in coin of any balances in its favor, and by refusing to take in payment of those balances the notes and drafts of the bank itself, not made payable at the bank or branch where the payment was to be made. In this way, and by this double power of oppression, the State institutions might be severely injured, and perhaps ruined, and that, too, when the balance to be paid had accrued solely from the payments towards the public revenue, and when the notes and drafts refused in payment, had also been received in collections of the public revenue. To guard against this contingency, the Secretary gave to a few of the banks in the large cities the transfer drafts in question, which drafts were made upon the United States Bank, or the branch at the point where the oppression was apprehended, and in favor of the State bank upon which it was anticipated the attempt might be made. In all cases, precise instructions were given that the drafts should be returned to the Department, without presentment, unless the balance before spoken of should be hastily demanded in coin, or unless the bank, or branch at the point, should refuse the notes of other branches, or the branch drafts, as money; but, in either of those contingencies, the drafts were to be presented, and the amount, taken from the public money left with the bank or branch, was to be transferred to the State bank, and passed to the credit of the public Treasury there.

The honorable Senator had selected the Manhattan Bank of New York, to illustrate the abuse he supposed to exist. In that case, the balance was demanded, and the notes of other branches of the bank, and the branch drafts, were refused to be received in payment, or passed to the credit of the bank offering them; the draft from the Department was presented and paid, and soon after the bank changed its course, and consented to receive all its notes and drafts which should be taken in payment of the public revenue, as money. Some of the other drafts were presented, and others were returned to the Department without presentment. These are the facts as to what the honorable Senator has so significantly termed loans to the State banks. How far they deserve that appellation, Mr. W. said, he would most cheerfully leave to the Senate and the public to judge. But, says the honorable Senator, the loans were made without interest. Has the honorable gentleman overlooked the facts, that the money was standing to the credit of the Treasurer, in the Bank of the United States, without interest? that the transaction was a mere transfer of the amount of the draft from the credit of the Treasurer, without interest, in one bank, to the credit of the Treasurer, without interest, in another bank? that the draft did not take one dollar from the Treasury? that the money, when placed to the credit of the Treasurer in the State bank, was no more a loan to it than when standing to the credit of the Treasurer in the Bank of the United States, it was a loan to it? and that, in either situation, the amount was equally subject to the drafts of the Treasurer at pleasure.

I am bound, said Mr. W., to give to the honorable Senator from Virginia my unfeigned thanks, for according to me sincerity in the declaration, made on a former day, that my opposition to the Bank of the United States did not proceed from a desire to transfer the location of that institution to my own State. I, at the same time, expressed my most firm conviction, that the opposition of that State proceeded from no such motive. Sir, said Mr. W., I was sincere in both declarations. The republicans of New York do not oppose this great moneyed power upon the narrow ground of selfish or local interest, much less from a desire to transfer its influence within the limits of their own State. Their opposition proceeds from higher motives, and is maintained for nobler purposes. They believe it to be a power dangerous to the Government; dangerous to the purity of our institutions; and dangerous to the liberties of the people. Many of them believe it to be a power unknown to the constitution, while others believe the constitutional power to create it may exist, but that it is a power which ought not to be called into exercise. Experience, which is claimed here to prove the necessity of such a bank, has proved to them that such an institution ought not to exist in a free country; and their resistance to its re-charter is based upon these high grounds of principle, and not upon any consideration of personal or local interest. The honorable gentleman's apprehensions, therefore, that this bank is to be destroyed merely to make room for another, similar or more powerful, to be located in New York, are without foundation.

Re-chartering Bank United States.

Mr. President, said Mr. W., am I required to adduce proof of this assertion? I need no better than the memorials from New York, almost daily laid before you, and nearly without an exception, if coming from the opponents of the administration, praying for the re-charter of the present bank. It is a fact, which does not admit of contradiction, that there is not, at this moment, in this Union, not even in the city of Philadelphia itself, a body of men more earnest, more active, and more untiring, in their efforts to effect a re-charter of the present bank, with its present location, than a large portion of the merchants and business men of the city of New York. The honorable Senator has told us that New York desires the regulation of the exchanges of the country, that her citizens may profit from the purchase and sale of bills. Sir, a very large proportion of the individuals to whom this position of the gentleman would apply, in case those who best understood the subject thought it applicable, a very large proportion of the exchange brokers and great money dealers of New York, are foremost in the cause of the present bank, and are using their utmost exertions to produce a re-charter. Need I stronger evidence to show that no concerted local movement, nor any perceptible local interest, is governing the course of that State upon this great question?

Mr. W. said he must now detain the Senate, while he very briefly replied to a few of the remarks of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] made upon the presentation of the bill to the Senate. And first, the honorable gentleman had stated that the safety-fund banks of New York were under the supervision of a political commission appointed by the Government. He, Mr. W., must express his profound regret, that he should so often meet with statements upon this floor, in relation to the safety-fund banks of New York, which were erroneous in fact and in conclusion, because gentlemen had not made themselves acquainted with the laws of that State regulating those banks. He had hoped that this would not have been the case with the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, but that he would have made himself familiar with that safety-fund system, before he made it the subject of remark here, and certainly before he passed sentence upon it as a political system. He had not done so, however, as was evident from the remark above referred to. The bank commissioners of the State of New York are three in number, and they are the officers whose duty it is to supervise the banks subject to the safety-fund law. So far from being a political commission, appointed by the Government of that State, as the honorable Senator has supposed, but one of the three commissioners is so appointed, and the remaining two are appointed by the banks themselves. The one is appointed upon the nomination of the Governor, and by the advice and consent of the Senate of the State, as officers of this Government are appointed by the President and Senate; and this commissioner may be considered as more especially the representative of the State, and of the public interests, in the board of commissioners. The State is divided into two districts for the appointment of the other two commissioners, and each is appointed by the banks of his district—every bank voting upon a uniform rule, according to the amount of its capital stock. These commissioners, thus appointed, are the exclusive representatives of the banks themselves, though the law makes no discrimination as to the powers and duties of the different members of the board. This is the true constitution and mode of appointment of that commission which the honorable Senator has denominated "a political commission, appointed by the Government." Sir, his mistake must have proceeded from his inattention to the law of which he was speaking, for he did not intend to produce an erroneous impression as to the character of these officers. He may, if he chooses, consider the commissioner appointed by the State a political officer.

I will not occupy the time of the Senate to point out the injustice of such a conclusion, because, when I find that officer guarded upon each side by an officer of equal powers, and charged with the same duties, and deriving, in both cases, their official character from the banks themselves, I sufficiently divest the board of the political character which the gentleman has ascribed to it. I cannot be mistaken in this conclusion, unless the honorable Senator shall contend that the banks select politicians as their representatives in the commission. If such be the ground he intends to assume, I can tell him, if the position were established, he, and not myself, would have occasion for joy that the commission was made political. It is a fact, Mr. President, which no one acquainted with the subject will deny, that a very large majority, I doubt not full two-thirds, of all the stocks of all the safety-fund banks in the State of New York, are owned and held by the political friends of the honorable gentleman, by persons opposed in politics to the present administration. The plain democrats of New York, sir, are not rich; they hold few stocks; they live not by banks, but by the labor of their hands. Surely, then, if this bank commission, constituted, as I have related, two of the three commissioners deriving their appointments from the votes of the holders of the stocks of these banks, be a political commission, it must represent the politics which the Senator himself approves, and it is not for him to complain of its character. But, Mr. President, the honorable Senator is mistaken: this commission is not a political commission; the banks in New York are not political banks, nor do they attempt to exert a political influence. The citizens of that State, of whatever political party, do not invest their capital in the banks for political purposes. They understand their interests too well to do so. They make their investments for the profit to be derived from them, and the banks are conducted with a single view to this object. I wish, sir, I had the power to persuade honorable Senators to permit their minds to be undeceived upon this point. They lead themselves into many mistakes, upon the subject of the New York banks, by adopting this error, and reasoning from it, without a proper acquaintance with the law or the facts, from which correct opinions would be formed. The banks of New York are not political institutions. Their object is to make money, and if they can do that, and if the laws be such as to protect their rights, and to facilitate their operations, directed to that object, they care not who rules, what political party triumphs, or what politician succeeds. I owe it to candor to say, Mr. President, that in former years, and before the establishment of the present system of banking in that State, I had heard of a very few instances in which banks were charged, with too much appearance of truth, with interfering in the politics of the State; but I am happy to be able to say, that those instances, so far as my information extends, have been "few and far between;" while, I believe, time has shown that every bank against which this charge was strongly supported, has turned out to be insolvent.

The honorable Senator again tells us, that the representatives from New York here, express great fears of the power and influence of the Bank of the United States, and asks if that State, with its league of banks, comprising together a capital of between 22 and 23,000,000 of dollars, has cause to fear this institution?

[Here Mr. WEBSTER explained, that Mr. W. had misapprehended his remark; that he had not said that the New York banks had no cause to fear the Bank of the United States; but that his argument was, that the Senators from that State expressed great fear as to the power and influence of the Bank of the United States, with a capital of thirty-five millions of dollars, extending its operations over the whole Union, while they expressed no fear whatever of the power and influence of the sixty-nine banks of their own State, embodying an aggregate capital of more than twenty-two millions, and leagued together by legal provisions.]

Mr. WRIGHT resumed. He said he owed it to the Senator to say, that he had misapprehended the force and direction of his remark; and he would conform his answer to his present understanding of its application. This, said Mr. W., will make it necessary for me to inquire how far the safety-fund banks of New York are, in the language of the honorable Senator, leagued together, so as to be properly viewed as one consolidated money power. The only common interest between them, Mr. W. said, was their obligation to contribute to a common fund, which fund was taken possession of by the State, and held for the security of the public—the bill-holders and depositors of the banks first, and for the benefit of the banks ultimately, in case it should not be expended on account of failures of the banks. To what extent could this contribution be carried—because that was the measure of the league between the banks? In the first instance, to a yearly payment of one-half of one per cent. upon the amount of the capital stock of each bank, which yearly payment was to be extended over the term of six years, and to amount, in the aggregate, to three per cent. upon the aggregate capital stock of all the banks subject to the provisions of the bank fund law. These contributions were to constitute the fund, the management of which remains with the State during the continuance of the charters of the banks; but the nett annual income of which, over and above expenses, is distributed to the banks in the proportion of their respective contributions. The fund is a trust fund, for the benefit and security of all who may have demands against the banks, other than the stockholders—and the State is the trustee; but, if those demands are discharged by the banks themselves, the fund is theirs, and is to be returned to them at the close of their respective charters, according to their respective interests in it; and, in the mean time, as I have before remarked, the annual earnings of the fund, lawful expenditures from it being first deducted, are annually paid to the banks. This is the first step of the league. Now for the second. In case a bank, subject to the bank fund law, fails, and the capital of the fund be reduced by the redemption of its notes, which are made redeemable at the Treasury of the State, so long as there are moneys belonging to the bank fund in the Treasury to redeem them with, then the contribution of one-half of one per cent. upon the capital stock of all the banks subject to the law, again commences, and continues until all obligations against the failing bank, in favor of bill-holders and depositors, are fully discharged, and until the capital of the fund is again restored to an amount equal to three per cent. upon the aggregate capitals of all the banks making the contributions.

This completes the liability of the New York safety-fund banks for each other; and this is the whole extent of all the provisions of the laws of that State creating such liability. Do they, then, deserve the appellation of "leagued banks," in the general acceptance of those terms? The contribution cannot, in any case, exceed the one-half of one per cent. per annum upon the capital stock of the bank upon which the liability rests; there is no community of capital; no community of dividends; no community of management; for each bank is managed by independent officers, and by an independent board of directors, giving to the business of the institution such a direction as they please, without any control from, or necessary consultation with, its neighboring institutions subject to the same laws; nor is there any community of liabilities, further than has been before mentioned; and it will be seen that nothing in those liabilities extends any community of security to the stockholders of the separate banks, or any community of risk and hazard beyond the obligation to contribute the one-half of one per cent. upon their capital stock yearly, in case misfortunes to other institutions should make such a call necessary. Are we, then, to be told that this connexion between independent banks constitutes a moneyed power to be feared, as is the power of a single bank of twelve millions greater capital, wielded by a single board of directors, by a single set of officers, and the whole force and influence of which, for any purpose, may be directed to a single object and to a single point, at pleasure? Sir, said Mr. W., I do not see the analogy. The New York banks are about seventy in number, embodying, in the aggregate, less than twenty-five millions of capital; each owned separately, by separate stockholders; each having separate objects and separate governments; all the inducements to healthful rivalry open to each against all the others; with no common interest or bond of union but the contingent liability to the trifling contribution before stated; a liability, to say the most, not greater than is required to restrain ruinous competition. Are these banks such a moneyed power as to deserve a comparison with the Bank of the United States, with its thirty-five millions of capital, wielded by a single hand? The republicans of New York think not, and hence they choose their own system as much the less evil, and seek to rid themselves and the country of the power and influence of a single institution, which they consider dangerous to liberty. This is my answer to the honorable Senator's remark, that we seem to be inconsistent in professing to fear the power of the bank of the United States, while we say nothing as to the power of our State banks.

Mr. President, said Mr. W., it has been said here and elsewhere, (I do not now refer to any remark of the Senator from Massachusetts,) that this contribution from the State banks of New York, might, by repeated failures, become perpetual, and might dangerously weaken those institutions. Sir, said Mr. W., if I am not in error, the State of Massachusetts imposes a permanent tax upon all the banks chartered by that Commonwealth, of one per cent. per annum, for the support of the Government. This tax is just double the contribution which can be imposed upon the safety-fund banks, and is perpetual without contingency; it is, too, a tax for the support of the State Government, in which the banks can have no interest subsequent to the payment; while the contributions from the New York banks enure to the benefit of the banks themselves, if a failure of some one of the institutions does not consume the fund. May I not, then, believe, that apprehension upon this point will be no longer entertained?

The honorable Senator entered his protest against what he called the war waged by the President against the bank. I propose, Mr. President, to examine the facts in relation to this controversy, and I feel great confidence in being able to satisfy those who hear me, that this protest comes from the wrong quarter; that the protest, if one is to be made, should come from the other side. In what manner has the President of the United States waged war upon the bank? This inquiry will be answered by a reference to his various messages, but I will not trouble the Senate further than to read from a single one. I find in the annual message communicated to Congress on the 8th day of December, 1829, the following notice of the bank:

"The charter of the Bank of the United States expires in 1836, and its stockholders will, most probably, apply for a renewal of their privileges. In order to avoid the evils resulting from precipitancy in a measure involving such important principles, and such deep pecuniary interests, I feel that I cannot, in justice to the parties interested, too soon present it to the deliberate consideration of the legislature and the people. Both the constitutionality and the expediency of the law creating this bank are well questioned by a large portion of our fellow-citizens; and it must be admitted by all, that it has failed in the great end of establishing a uniform and sound currency."

Re-chartering Bank United States.

This is the mention of the bank made in the first message of the President, and what is it? Not an attempt to interfere with the chartered rights and privileges of the institution, but a timely expression of doubt as to the propriety of its re-charter, conveyed in the mildest language, and proceeding from the best of motives, to wit: "to avoid the evils resulting from precipitancy in a measure involving such important principles, and such deep pecuniary interests."

Was this a declaration of war against the bank? Was it an act of hostility to that institution, thus to warn it to prepare in time for its final close? Was it wrong in the President to say, what he knew to be true, that "both the constitutionality and the expediency of the law creating this bank are well questioned by a large portion of our fellow-citizens?" Was it waging war against the bank to question the expediency of its re-charter? Sir, the bank has chosen so to consider it, and, in a publication recently made by its board of directors, the paragraph I have just read from the message of 1829 is termed an "assault" upon the bank. Notices of a similar character, in substance, were taken of the bank in the two following annual messages, and, in 1832, when both Houses of Congress passed a bill to re-charter the institution, the President refused his assent to it, and, in a respectful message, communicated his reasons for that refusal to this body. This is all the war he has waged against the bank; and the honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] upon a late occasion, told us that these messages were all "non-committal" documents; that they did not even make known to Congress and the country the opinions of the President in relation to the bank. Permit me now, Mr. President, said Mr. W., to examine the other side of this controversy. Immediately after the publication of the message of the President, in December, 1829, the bank commenced its efforts against his re-election. By its own showing, its expenditures for the printing and distribution of matter calculated and intended to influence public opinion, commenced at that period, and were continued in an increasing ratio through that whole Presidential term. It made itself a political instrument, and acted in open and avowed hostility to the President. Who does not know, sir, that the immense sums paid for printing, were so paid for printing political matter? Who does not know that the speeches made in this body upon the veto message, in July, 1832, were calculated and intended to influence the elections of the coming fall? I mean no disrespect, sir, to any individual by the remark. The speeches upon that occasion could not fail to have that tendency, nor can any one doubt that they were re-printed and broadly distributed by the bank because they were of that character. It is also abundantly shown to us, that it caused to be printed and spread over the whole country, newspapers and other political publications, with a profusion never before witnessed upon a similar occasion. These were the first steps in the war waged by the bank against the President. Upon a recent occasion, its board of directors have issued to the public, and laid upon our tables, a communication, in which, as if to mark the character of their hostility, they class the President of the United States with the persons who counterfeit their notes, and tell us that, as kindred subjects, they have received, and will receive, kindred treatment at the hands of the bank. Is not this, sir, waging war against the President? And who, then, should protest? I pronounce that the war is not one waged by the President against the bank, but a war waged by the bank against the President, and, as such, I protest against it: the country will protest against it: the people who have elected the President do and will protest against it.

The honorable Senator intimated, in the course of his remarks, that I had, upon a former occasion, made an appeal to the prejudices of the people against banks. Sir, I have made no such appeal. I did appeal to their good sense, as applied to the information before them, in relation to the conduct of this institution, to which I have just referred; to its interference with the elections of officers of the Government; to its open and avowed political action; to its treatment of the President of their choice. I did appeal to the patriotism and love of liberty of the people against this bank, for having thus exerted its immense moneyed power to corrupt the press, endanger the safety of our free institutions, and control the Government. This appeal I did make, and I understood the honorable Senator, in the earnestness of debate, to permit himself to characterize it with the harsh appellation of a fraud.

Sir, this may be the honorable gentleman's opinion, but, in matters of this sort, opinion is every thing. Entertaining the opinions I entertain, it is the imperious duty of every representative of the people, here or elsewhere, to make and reiterate these appeals, not to the prejudices, but to the intelligence of our citizens; to expose the profligate conduct of this bank; to point out the danger to our free institutions of its continued existence; and to mark the progress of its moneyed power, "withering, as with a subtle poison," that purity and truth which are the only safeguards of freedom. Sir, had I, with my opinions, made declarations from my place here, calculated to produce alarm in the public mind; to shake the confidence of the people in the public officers of their own choice; to create distrust towards the local banks; to unsettle dependence upon the credit and currency of the country generally; and to produce a feeling of agitation and panic, I ought not to have been surprised even if the strong charge of an attempt to practise a fraud upon the public had been made against me. Entertaining the opinions I do, were I to attempt to convince the free citizens of this republic that the country cannot get on without the aid of an immense moneyed incorporation; without the aid of a bank large enough to control all our moneyed operations; large enough to control the Government itself; and to convince them that the continuance of their liberties is dependent upon such an institution, I should subject myself to the accusation of an attempt to lead them into error. I do not intend, Mr. President, in making these remarks, to impute any but the most honorable intentions to any member of this body, and I make them to show how very differently we view the same act; how very different our opinions are in reference to this bank. I think the honorable Senator could not have given sufficient weight to this consideration when he spoke of the course of any individual as fraudulent towards the public. It is my design, upon this as upon all occasions, to extend to others that charity I ask for myself, and while I claim sincerity of purpose for my own language, and my own acts, I as readily accord it to those who differ from me in opinion.

Another remark of the honorable Senator appears to me to deserve a similar reply. He told us, in his usual emphatic manner, when speaking of appeals to the people, that he knew such appeals, sometimes, made little men great, but that great men never resorted to such expedients. I have before remarked, that opinion, in matters of this sort, is every thing. Now, without the least design to impute to the honorable member any motive which is not strictly pure, I must be permitted to say to him, that too ardent a friendship for an institution, such as I, in my conscience, believe the Bank of the United States to be, may not make great men greater.

The honorable Senator urges that this bank, having been chartered, and having incorporated itself and its transactions with the business of the country, ought not now to be thus suddenly destroyed. Is it right, sir, to call the destruction sudden? Did not the President, as long ago as in December, 1829, give it the most emphatic warning to prepare for its final close? Has he not done so, annually, from that time to the present? What, Mr. President, was the effect of that warning? The whole debt due to the bank in December, 1829, when the first message of the President was transmitted to Congress, expressing doubts as to the constitutionality or expediency of a re-charter of the bank, was, I think, about $42,000,000, perhaps $44,000,000, as I speak from memory, and cannot pretend to be precisely accurate. In May, 1832, this debt had increased to the enormous amount of more than $70,000,000, thus showing a constant and rapid extension of its loans as the final termination of its charter approached. Did the bank suppose that the grant of the monopoly to it for the period of twenty years gave it a right to expect or demand a continuance? Its constant extension of its business, as it approached the close of its chartered term, would seem to indicate such an opinion; but I respectfully submit that the reverse ought to have been its conclusion. The privileges granted to it were of immense value, and a proper sense of the justice of Congress should have induced its stockholders to believe, even if the existence of a similar bank was to be continued in the country, that they would not be made, for a second term, the exclusive recipients of this great bounty.

There is, Mr. President, said Mr. W., another view of this subject, which strikes my mind with great force, and which, in my judgment, justifies the charge against the bank of a violation of one of its highest duties. The period of its existence was distinctly fixed upon the face of its charter, and it owed it to the country, as its highest duty, to prepare for that period in a manner which should enable it to go out of existence without a shock to any great national interest. The Government conferred upon this institution privileges and benefits inestimable; and, in return for that liberality, it was its duty to come into existence, to pass its prescribed term, and to meet its close, without being the cause of any convulsion in trade, or credit, or currency. The bank was a creature of the law, and with the law it should have prepared itself to die quietly. This it has not done; but, on the contrary, as the termination of its legal existence approached, it has exerted its utmost power to strengthen its claims to a new existence. It has spread abroad its immense resources, and drawn within its vortex thousands of citizens, who, when the warning was given to it by the President to prepare for its dissolution, were free from its influence, independent of its power. It has pursued a course in direct contradiction to the dictates of interest, if it had intended to submit to the contract between it and the Government, and to terminate its existence at the prescribed limit. Do I then, said Mr. W., do injustice to the bank, when I infer that this course has been adopted to force an extension of its charter? Other motive for the admitted conduct cannot be assigned.

Still we are told that this bank must not be thus suddenly closed, because the shock given to trade and commerce, and the call upon debtors, will be greater than the country can sustain, and the bill before us proposes to extend its charter for the term of six years, to enable it to close its business. Sir, did not the President give to this institution more than six years' notice that it must close its affairs with the expiration of its present charter? Did it accept that notice and prepare itself for the event? So far from it, its business was at once extended, and, by its own acts, its final close rendered more and more difficult, without distress to the country. Grant it the time proposed by the bill before the Senate, and what assurance have we that, at the expiration of the first four years of the period, its debt will not be extended to $100,000,000, instead of being reduced below 55,000,000 dollars, where it now stands? A rapid curtailment has taken place for the last five months; a curtailment so rapid as to embarrass and distress the whole country, and to derange all its business operations, and still the debt due to the bank is more than $12,000,000 greater than it was in December, 1829, when the President, by his message to Congress, warned it to prepare for its final close at the expiration of its charter. I must, Mr. President, be permitted to express my full conviction, drawn from these facts, that it is not the design of the bank to discharge its duty to the public by a quiet close of its affairs, but that, on the contrary, it is its settled purpose to force a re-existence, to overrule the Government, coerce public opinion, and compel a re-charter.

We are told, Mr. President, by the honorable Senator, that we must have a national bank; and what, sir, is the reason urged, as conclusive upon us, to establish the position? It is the existence of the present pressure upon the money market of the country, said to exist, in contemplation of the winding up of the present bank. Sir, said Mr. W., this proves to me merely, not that we want a bank, but that we have a bank. Whence does the distress and pressure complained of proceed? It, no doubt, has its origin in a complication of causes, among which a general system of over-trading and the change of the revenue laws are among the most important; but I cannot doubt that by far the most powerful cause, at this time in operation, is the hostile attitude which the Bank of the United States has thought it for her interest to assume towards the State banks. We have it in evidence among the documents of Congress, upon the oath of the chief officer of the bank, Mr. Biddle himself, that that institution has the power to crush the State banks at pleasure; that they exist by its clemency alone, and not because it has not the power to shut their doors. The evidences of a disposition to exert that power, have, for the last few months, been strong and numerous. Have we not heard it predicted, Mr. President, from all sides of this chamber, that the State banks would be compelled to stop specie payments within a short period of time? Have we not seen the bank presses calling upon the community to make runs upon those banks, telling the poor laborer who had a five dollar note of a State bank to call and get the specie for it before it became a valueless rag in his pocket? Can these indications have been mistaken, sir? In the State which I have the honor in part to represent here, I am happy to know that they have not either been mistaken or disregarded; and I hope I may not find myself mistaken in the belief, that the banks of that State are prepared to meet the blow intended for them. From the latest advices I have received, I am authorized to suppose that they have withdrawn from circulation and redeemed from $4,000,000 to $5,000,000 of their notes, within the last sixty or seventy days. The effect of this extensive curtailment upon the merchants, and, indeed, upon all classes of the community, must be severe, but self-protection and self-preservation require the course at the hands of the banks, and they have no volition. It would be madness for them not to prepare for their defence, when they are publicly told that this immense moneyed power, with $35,000,000 of capital at command, is about to aim a deadly blow at them; when they know it has vaunted its power over them, and proved upon oath that its forbearance was the tenure by which they held their existence. The banks, then, cannot extend themselves while this all-powerful enemy stands ready to take the first advantage of their exposure, and to push it to their ruin. Sir, is there any other cause for this rapid curtailment, and this close defensive position assumed by the State banks? I know of none. There can be none. There is no peculiar demand for specie growing out of the state of trade and the condition of exchange; but, on the contrary, the reverse is to a greater extent true than it has been at any former period of our history. Specie is, at this moment, abundant in the country, and its flow is to, not from us.

Re-chartering Bank United States.

I cannot, then, be mistaken when I say, that if the Bank of the United States would cease its efforts for, and its hopes of, a re-existence, and would endeavor to perform its duty to the country, by closing its affairs with as little injury as possible to any individual or public interest, the State banks would be able to extend their loans, confidence would be restored, and the pressure upon the money market would soon cease. Apprehension, a just apprehension of the hostile movements of this great institution, is the most powerful cause of the present scarcity of money. This scarcity must exist so long as this apprehension continues. How, then, is it to be allayed, would seem to be the pertinent inquiry? The honorable Senator from Massachusetts answers us by the bill upon your table. Re-charter the bank; appease the monster by prolonging its existence and increasing its power. I say, No, sir; but act promptly and refuse its wish; destroy its hope of a re-charter, and you destroy its inducement to be hostile to the State institutions. A different interest, the interest of its stockholders, to wind up its affairs as profitably to themselves as possible, becomes its ruling object, and will direct its policy. The more prosperous the country, the more plenty the money of other institutions, the more easily and safely can this object be accomplished; and every hope of a continued existence being destroyed, that this will be the object of the bank is as certain as that its moneyed interest governs a moneyed incorporation. Mr. President, this is unquestionably the opinion of the country. Look, sir, at the files of memorials upon your table, and however widely they may differ as to their views of the bank, they all hold to you this language, "Act speedily, and finally settle the question."

But we are told, sir, that the country cannot sustain the winding up of the affairs of this bank. Is this so? What does experience teach us upon this subject? The old Bank of the United States, within four months of the close of its charter, was more extended in proportion to the amount of its capital than the present bank is at this moment, and still it is almost two years to the close of its charter. The old bank struggled as this does for a re-existence; the country was then alarmed, memorials in favor of the bank were then, as now, piled upon the tables of the members of Congress; the cries of distress rung through these halls then, as distinctly as they now do; nay, more, gentlemen were then sent here from the commercial cities to be examined upon oath, before the committees of Congress, to prove the existence and the extent of the distress; business was then in a state of the utmost depression in all parts of the Union; commerce was literally suspended by the restrictive measures of the Government; trade was dull beyond any former example; property of all kinds was unusually depressed in price; and the country was on the eve of a war with the most powerful nation in the world. Still Congress was unmoved, and the old bank was not re-chartered. Such is the history of that period, and, with the final action of Congress, all knowledge of the distress ceased. Who has ever heard of disasters to the business of the country proceeding from the winding up of the old bank? I, sir, can find no trace of any such consequences. I do find that, in a period of about eighteen months after the expiration of the charter, the bank disposed of its other obligations, and divided to its stockholders about eighty-eight per cent. upon their stock.

It is now admitted, on all hands, that the country is rich and prosperous in an unusual degree; property of all kinds is abundant; commerce is free and extensive and flourishing, and business of every description is healthful and vigorous. If, then, we cannot, in this condition of things, sustain the closing of the affairs of this great moneyed incorporation, it is safe to assume that the country will never see the time when it can do it. Grant it longer life and deeper root, and in vain shall we try in future to shake it from us. It will dictate its own terms, and command its own existence. Indeed, Mr. President, the whole tendency of the honorable Senator's argument, seemed to me to be to prove the necessity of a perpetual bank of this description, and we have been repeatedly told, during the debate of the last three months, that this free, and rich, and prosperous country, cannot get on without a great moneyed power of this description to regulate its affairs. The bill before the Senate proposes to repeal the monopolizing provision in the existing charter, and the honorable Senator tells us that this is to be done that Congress may, within the six years over which this is to extend the life of the present bank, establish a new bank to take its place, and into which the affairs of the old may be transferred, so as to be finally closed without a shock to the country. Sir, this is not the relief I seek. My object is the entire discontinuance and eradication of this or any similar institution. We are told the distresses of the country will not permit this now. When, sir, will it ever permit it better? When will the time come that this odious institution can be finally closed with less distress than now? Never, while cupidity obeys its fixed laws.

This distress, Mr. President, did not exist when we left our homes; we heard not of it then; it commenced with the commencement of our debates here; and I doubt not it will end when our debates end, and our final action is known, whatever may be the result to which we shall arrive. It must necessarily be temporary; and it does not prove to my mind the necessity of a bank, but the mischiefs a bank may produce. I care not whether it be or be not in the power of the bank to ameliorate the evils now complained of. That it can cause them in any manner, is proof that, if the disposition exist, it can cause them at pleasure, and this very fact is the strongest evidence, to my mind, that no institution, with such a power, ought to exist in this country.

Sir, the subject of our present action involves two great principles: one of constitutional power, and one of governmental expediency. Upon neither should our action be governed solely by considerations of temporary derangement and distress in the money market. Revulsions in trade and business and pecuniary affairs will happen. They must be temporary; the country will restore itself, and money will again be plenty; but the settlement of important principles must involve consequences of an enduring character—consequences which will exert an influence for good or evil, through all time.

Mr. WEBSTER said, in reply to Mr. WAIGHT: The honorable member contends that those who thought the bank was created by an unconstitutional exercise of power could not vote to continue it, even for the shortest length of time, under any circumstances whatever. I am not in the predicament of those who hold that opinion, and therefore the argument is not addressed to me. If it were, I should simply say, that I think the gentleman's conclusion a non sequitur. If the general voice of the country has declared the bank constitutional, as it repeatedly and constantly has done, I think a just deference to the judgment of others might induce those who hold a different opinion to refrain from suddenly discontinuing the bank, at the cost of so much difficulty and distress to the country. I do not well perceive how any man can undertake, on the strength of his own opinion, to understand and to administer the constitution in a sense opposite to that in which he knows a vast majority, both of the States and of the people, receive and understand it, and have so done from its very beginning.

The honorable member has said, that the bank has many friends in the State he comes from; and that the most ardent and active of them are the great money-dealers in the city of New York. My information is quite different from this. I think the fact is quite the other way. I think it is as clear as daylight, that those who are most anxious for the continuance of the bank are the traders on small capitals, the men of active business, the manufacturers, the mechanics, and the whole class of the industrious and enterprising. All the memorials, all the proceedings of public meetings, public complaints and petitions, in all their forms, prove this, incontestably. I do not conceive how it is possible for a gentleman to say that brokers and money-dealers are the most zealous for the continuance of the bank. I am widely at issue, therefore, with the gentleman, on this general fact. I maintain that a continuance of the bank is desired, more earnestly than by any others, by the active class of society; by those whose living depends on their own earnings.

The honorable member thinks me inaccurate in my remarks on the safety-fund system of New York. He says that only one of the three commissioners, not all of them, as I had supposed, holds his place by a political appointment, the other two being appointed by the banks themselves. The honorable member is no doubt correct in this; but still, whether the board be not a political board, depends on the fact, whether both or either of these two commissioners are, or are not, appointed on political grounds, and act with political views.

The honorable member says, too, that two-thirds of the stock of all the safety-fund banks belongs to those whom he calls my friends. I hope, sir, that I have friends among stockholders in banks as well as other classes of society in that State; but I must pray the gentleman not to denominate any one class of men as being particularly my friends, as if there was more friendship between me and any one class, than there is between me and all the other classes.

[Mr. WRIGHT said, he only meant that they acted politically with Mr. WEBSTER.]

I dare say, continued Mr. WEBSTER, the honorable member intended no improper inference should be drawn from his remark; but I must repel every inference, even though unintended, from any gentleman's remark, that any one set of men, in this country, have greater favor to expect from me than the rest; or, that I look for the regard or friendship of any one class, more than that of all others.

It may be very true, sir, to return to the subject, that more than half of the banking capital of the State of New York belongs to persons opposed to the administration. But this proves nothing, except that the administration is not acceptable to the great commercial interest of the city of New York. The banks in that city are large, and their capital makes a great part of the aggregate capital of the whole. But the gentleman will not say, that throughout the State, especially in the great western district, any considerable number of the safety-fund banks are under any other control than that of the friends of the administration.

Take all the banks in the country which have been incorporated since the safety-fund system was established, and can the gentleman mention one which has not been studiously and designedly placed in the hands of political friends? Is there, now-a-days, any such thing as obtaining a bank charter from the legislature of New York, without commissioners, named in the act itself, to distribute the stock; and is there any one instance, in which a majority of shares is not allotted to men of one particular political party? Will the gentleman say, that a hundred of the first merchants of New York, or Albany, or Utica, or Buffalo, could this day obtain a charter, for themselves and their associates, the stock to be divided as they might choose? I am altogether misinformed, if any such thing could be expected. With us, and I suppose elsewhere, banking is no monopoly. Certain general laws regulate the whole business, and one class of persons has the same right, and the same facility, in applying for and receiving charters, as others, if they conform to the general law, and show a probable necessity for the institution which they ask for. No question is asked, as to what school, or what party, the applicants belong; and this is as it should be. To place all bank circulation, and bank accommodation, and bank influence, into party hands, to be used for party purposes, would be, and is, if such a thing anywhere exists, an enormity, worthy only of the worst Governments.

The honorable member objects to my protest against the war waged by the President against the bank. He says it comes from the wrong side; and that it would be more just to protest against the war waged by the bank against the Government. Sir, the protest is not mine; I do nothing but present it. It comes from seven thousand of the citizens of Boston, well able to make it good. It was not their purpose to go into the origin of this war, to inquire who published the first manifesto, or who first took up arms. They saw such a war actually existing; prosecuted, and carried on; and they found themselves greatly injured by it, and therefore they protested against it. They had no protest to make to the bank, because the bank was not their agent, nor their Government; but they do protest, and have a right to protest, against the Executive Government entering into any such quarrel. And it will be wise to regard their protest. They are earnest who make it, and those should not be deaf to whom it is addressed.

But, sir, it is true, that, speaking on another occasion, I did myself say that the Secretary of the Treasury had made an attack on the bank; and I repeat the declaration. In his report on the removal of the deposits, he not only assails the general character and proceedings of the bank, and imputes to its directors the worst designs, but he directly questions its ability for the ultimate and punctual payment of its debts. He assaults its commercial credit. Yet, sir, in this very bank, which the Secretary not only charges with violations of its charter, but against the credit of which he indulges in strong remarks, the United States themselves had seven millions of dollars; and a law of Congress, which the Secretary cannot repeal, makes its bills a tender in all debts and dues to the Government! The Secretary declares to the whole world, of this institution, thus most intimately connected with the highest interests of the Government, that if the Government should leave large sums in its vaults, its ability to be prompt in the payment thereof to Government, hereafter, might well be doubted!—a declaration, in my opinion, in all respects of most extraordinary character. He says, too, that it is well understood that its superior credit was not founded on any particular confidence in its management, but was occasioned altogether by the agreement to receive its notes in payments to the United States; thus intimating that it owed its commercial credit to the favor of Government, and leaving others to infer what would happen to that credit when such favor was withdrawn. Fortunately for the country, as well as the bank, its credit has been able to stand against all sorts of Executive denunciations.

The honorable member, sir, has said, that there seems to be a disposition to impute to him, or to others, an inclination to appeal to the prejudices of the people, and to support the administration by an outcry of danger to liberty, to be apprehended from the bank. This the honorable member repels, and declares that he makes his addresses to the good sense, and to the patriotism of the people, and not to their prejudices. Such, it is true, sir, are the captions of all such addresses, whether made in or out of Congress. They are all headed, "To the good sense and patriotism of the people." I do not expect to hear those, who raise a false alarm about liberty, begin by saying, "Friends, I address myself to your prejudices; I know your love of liberty, and I come to take advantage of it; you have a weak side, and I mean to attack it; all that I say of danger to liberty is mere pretence, and, disguised under that pretence, I have far different objects." No, no, sir. None of the formulas have this sort of beginning; they more usually run after this fashion: "My enlightened fellow-citizens! Nothing but devotion to your interest could induce me to raise my voice against the monster! Your liberties are in the utmost peril! Nothing but one man's efforts can save them from destruction! A bank is an engine of despotism! A moneyed aristocracy is overturning the constitution! Sons of martyred sires! will you hesitate longer to trust all your rights, and place all your hopes in one man's hands? Huzza! then, for him, who can place his own foot, and help us place our feet, on the neck of the monster! Be assured, my enlightened fellow-citizens, that in saying all this, I appeal not to your prejudices—God forbid!—but to your good sense and your patriotism."

This, sir, appears to me to be something like the usual strain of discourse, by which the public mind is to be reasoned into opposition to the bank.

Sir, do men of intelligence, in or out of Congress, really believe that there is danger to public liberty to be feared from the bank? I can hardly think it possible; yet the honorable member from New York says, he does fear such danger, and of course he is to be believed; but, it is possible that men, whose vision is not, unconsciously to themselves, distorted by politics and party, can see any such thing? Was there one man in five thousand, who felt or expressed any such fear, until party, beginning the cry here, shouted it over all the land, for mere party purposes? We have had a bank, sir, for near forty years; that is to say, almost as long as we have had a Government; the people have felt no evil from it, nor apprehended any danger: it is only when its continuance becomes connected with questions of party politics, that the alarm bells are all set ringing, and, on such occasions, it must be confessed, their din is almost stunning. Where was this apprehension for liberty when the present bank was created? Its vigilant guardians in New York, how happened it that they were all then found sleeping? How happened the bank to receive the vote of all the members from that State, except a few, whom the gentleman would not be likely to allow to be the most watchful sentinels of liberty? Sir, the gentleman says that I have spoken of these expressions of fear and apprehensions of alarm, as being fraudulent: of course, sir, I apply no such epithet to what may be said by any gentleman in debate here; but, that all which we hear out-doors on this subject emanates from good sense and honest purpose, is more than can easily be believed.

The gentleman, sir, in another part of his remarks, has said, that I have declared that we must always have a Bank of the United States, in all time to come. I have not said so. [Mr. WALKER rose and said he had only meant to contend that that was the result of Mr. WEBSTER'S reasoning.] That, said Mr. WEBSTER, is the gentleman's own inference. What I did say, I am ready to repeat; and that is, that, looking to the present political and commercial state of the country, to the actual existence of so many State banks, and the duty imposed by the constitution on Congress, respecting the currency, I do not see how that duty can be performed without the instrumentality of a national bank. Times may change, and a bank may become unnecessary; but, in the present state of things, I am free to confess that I regard a bank, established by Congress, as an indispensable instrument in the beneficial administration of Government. The honorable gentleman inquires what security there is, if this bill for continuing the bank for a limited time pass, that, instead of reducing its debt, the bank will not go on augmenting it, till it run up to a hundred millions? Sir, such a thing is impossible. All the restrictions in the present charter are retained, and the bill which I propose, authorizes Congress to make another bank, and to place the public revenues in such bank whenever it pleases. A leading feature in this bank is, that it leaves the whole matter open to the deliberation of Congress. Congress, therefore, can, at any time, adopt measures, should they be necessary, to compel the bank to collect its debts.

This, sir, is the answer to the gentleman's inquiry. It will be seen that, by this bill, the deposits are to be restored to the bank, but, at all times hereafter, to be subject to be removed at the pleasure of Congress.

But, Mr. President, there is one singular objection made to the bank by the gentleman. In point of form, at least, it is a new indictment. It is, that the bank will not, as in duty bound, die easy! It holds out contumaciously against the Government, while the Government is admonishing it to yield up its breath without a struggle. It insists on a renewed existence, says the gentleman; it claims a re-charter, in opposition to the known will of Government. The Government! Why, sir, what is the Government? The Government, the gentleman says, has warned the bank to resign its being quietly, but the bank still stands out against the will of Government. What Government, sir? What is the Government? Who has warned the bank not to expect renewal? Not Congress, certainly. Congress has passed a bill for continuing its charter for fifteen years, by large majorities in both Houses; and one of the last acts of the House of Representatives was to express its undiminished confidence in the bank. And yet, sir, we are told that the Government has warned the bank to die in peace, but that the bank stubbornly clings to life, in opposition to the well-known will and kind warning of the Government. Ay, sir, the Government! We understand what the gentleman here means by Government. This House is nothing; the other House is nothing; both are nothing. The President is the Government! Sir, lexicographers frame their definitions of words and terms from their actual use; and if one of them was now compiling a political dictionary, he would find much recent authority for defining Government, in a free country, to mean the Chief Executive Magistrate.

The bank has had solemn warning, it is said, not to apply for a continuance. What is this solemn warning? Where is it to be found? Is it found in the strong vote of the two Houses granting a new charter? Is it found in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, at the very session when the two Houses passed the bill? Is it found in the petitions and memorials on our table? No, sir. It is found no where but in the declaration of the President; his will alone is to stand for the decision of Government. But the President himself—when did he first give this warning? The first message in which he mentioned the subject, contained an expression of his opinion, that the prolongation of the bank charter was matter fit to be considered and decided by Congress, and recommended to Congress to take up the subject at an early day, and consider and decide upon it accordingly. Congress, in due time, acted on this recommendation. It took up the subject, it did consider it, and it did decide upon it. It passed a bill as the result of its deliberations, and that bill the President negated.

The honorable member has gone into other topics. He has remarked upon the cause, the precise and particular cause, which occasions, as he thinks, the present pressure on the country. He finds this cause in the hostile conduct of the Bank of the United States towards the State banks. This is his opinion, but it happens not to be the opinion of these State banks themselves. A great majority of such as we have heard from, almost all of them, instead of any such cause, unite in assigning the distress to a very different one, that is to say, to the conduct of the Secretary; and, on this subject, I cannot but think their opinions better authority than those of the gentleman. Sir, if the conduct of the bank towards the State banks be fit to be complained of, why do they not complain? Why do not the deposit banks themselves find fault? Why do they not speak out, and make the hostility of the Bank of the United States towards them public and manifest? Sir, they pretend to no such thing. Pressed as they are on all sides, and anxious as they must be to shift responsibility from themselves to others, they do not, nevertheless, undertake to come before us and charge the Bank of the United States with any acts of hostility or unkindness.

Re-chartering Bank United States.

[SENATE.]

But, sir, in conclusion, the honorable member has his measure of relief, very general, it must be admitted, and very simple. It is, that we should settle the question. By which he means, I suppose, that one House or both should vote their approbation of the Secretary's proceedings. But what would this settle? It might settle the question immediately pending; but it would not settle the subject. It would not compose the public agitation, because it would not restore the public prosperity. This is the mistake, sir, which, as it appears to me, the friends of the administration daily commit. They seem to think that the great questions which now so generally occupy and so deeply agitate the country, are to be settled by authority. They think all will be quiet and prosperous again, if only the Senate and the House of Representatives would approve the Secretary's conduct. Sir, they deceive themselves. No such superficial remedy will touch the source of the disease; and this people, sir, are not a people to be satisfied merely with opinions from high places. If they believe the laws to have been violated, they will insist that they be redressed; if they feel severe distress, arising from political mismanagement, they will demand relief, and will continue to demand it, and, until it be obtained, they will not be hushed into quiet by any lullaby whatever.

Mr. LEIGH rose and said: The gentleman from New York has entirely mistaken the import and the purpose of several of the remarks made by me the other day, which he has thought worthy of his notice. I am far more disposed to impute his misconception to my own want of clearness and precision, than to any defect of apprehension on his part; and, as others may have fallen into similar mistakes, it is well, at once, to give such explanations of my meaning, in some of the particulars alluded to, as will leave no room for misunderstanding.

In the first place, when I said that the putting down of the existing bank might very probably (I add now, that I believe it will certainly) be followed by the incorporation of another national bank, liable to all the constitutional objections which, in the judgment of the people of Virginia, condemn the charter of the present bank, with no other differences but such as will aggravate the evil, I did not, as the gentleman from New York supposes, rest my objection to that project of a new national bank, of which I spoke, on the single circumstance that the mother bank would be located in New York. That was, in my mind, no otherwise an objection to the scheme, than as it might contribute to make it acceptable there, and thus to fasten it upon us. I said that the only differences between the charter of the present bank and that of the national bank which is likely to succeed it, would probably consist in the location of the mother bank at New York, and in the vesting of an absolute control over the direction in the President of the United States. Of this last principle, the gentleman from New York has taken no notice; yet, it was this principle on which I chiefly dwelt; this principle which may serve to recommend it to Executive approbation; this principle which will multiply Executive influence threefold, fivefold, tenfold; it was this principle that was chiefly the object of my abhorrence and dread, and will excite the apprehensions and indignation of every man who has been at all sensible of the "awful squinting of this Government towards monarchy," or who has not, of late, from use and habit, become enamored of that deformity. Is it supposed that the people, particularly the people of Virginia, have forgotten the propension of this Government to monarchy, as well as consolidation? or that they have become reconciled to its monarchical tendencies, or astounded by the rapidity with which they are working? and that they will lend a hand to accelerate the operation of them? If we wilfully shut our eyes to the progress of things; if we are so supine and neglectful as not to guard our institutions against the approaches of power, carried on in broad day; if the phrensy of party spirit, so apt to dim men's vision and deprave their civic character, is to be still cherished and vaunted as the chief merit of the citizen; if the support of Executive prerogative is to be the chief test of republicanism, then we shall await the experiment of that "political bank," which I see more and more reason every hour to apprehend; and then, too, we may surely expect to pay the penalty we shall deserve, in the privation, not of property, but of liberty. My part of the punishment I must bear; I will not incur any share of the guilt. The gentleman from New York says he thinks any national bank would be unconstitutional. He does not profess to think, he cannot think, that the President is of that opinion. I repeat, that the President, in his veto message, declared to the nation, that he would have furnished Congress a scheme of a national bank, if he had been asked to do so. What that scheme was, he did not think proper to indicate; whatever it was, the gentleman from New York, no more than I, can think his bank would have been constitutional; and he may rely upon it, there are no constitutional objections that will induce the President to veto a bank charter framed to his liking.

The gentleman seems to suppose that I expressed a doubt of the patriotism of the Western States, while he relies on it as sufficient to make them bear every evil, however oppressive, provided it is inflicted by their Government. The gentleman cannot entertain a higher opinion of their loyalty to the Union than I do; but let Government beware not to put their loyalty to trials which no loyalty can endure. I am, myself, sincerely, most sincerely, attached to the Union; and it was for that very reason I thought it right to forewarn my countrymen of the danger which is hanging over it. Would to Heaven I could believe the danger imaginary!

Taking the present state of things to exhibit the permanent system of the Government, and adverting to the state and course of business in the country, I intimated the opinion that the system, if persisted in under such circumstances, would give New York such advantages, such a command over the whole commerce of the country, as must make her mistress of the empire. Of the correctness of the general proposition I am quite sure; but I did not, because I was not able to, develop it in all its bearings. The gentleman, neither admitting nor controverting the justness of my conclusions, contents himself with saying that the rest of the Union, and especially Virginia, cannot be so unreasonable as to object to the enjoyment, by the city of New York, of all its natural advantages; and he does me no more than justice, when he expresses his assurance that I will not. No, certainly we will not. But the gentleman will be pleased to reflect, that advantages given to New York by the action of this Government, advantages given to her at the expense of every other part of the country, are not natural advantages, but factitious, unnatural, undue advantages, in which it is altogether unreasonable to expect us to acquiesce. If I am right in my estimate of the character and extent of those advantages, they ought to excite, they will, they must excite, public attention and the most anxious deliberation throughout the country.

In reference to the decision which the people of Virginia will make between the renewal of the charter of the Bank of the United States and the various alternatives which I apprehend the developments of the present year may present to them, the gentleman from New York, apparently supposing that I declared a contrary opinion, took upon himself to say that they will not give their consent to the renewal of the charter of the present bank, which they believe to be unconstitutional, in order to avoid other measures, even though these should also be unconstitutional, and of far more pernicious consequence. Now, I pray the Senate to remember that I did not undertake to say how the people of Virginia will decide between the alternatives that may, and I have no doubt will, be presented to them; and if the gentleman only knew with what respect we are in the habit of regarding the deliberate judgment of the people, and the expression of their will, he would understand the reason why I did not presume to declare my opinion what their decision will be.

But, in the decision of such a question, in the choice between evils, some one or other of which is inevitable, it is not morally possible, it is not right, to pay no regard to pre-existing facts which have already worked their effects; no regard to the actual circumstances of the nation, which, however produced, can nowise be altered; no regard to consequences. This is what the people of Virginia have never done. Even in respect to this question of a national bank, they have hitherto never done so. When the question of the renewal of the charter of the old Bank of the United States was pending before Congress, in 1811, the General Assembly of Virginia declared its opinion that the institution was unconstitutional, and on that ground alone, instructed the Senators of the State in Congress to vote against the renewal of the charter. But soon afterwards, in 1814, when Mr. Dallas's scheme of a national bank (regarded as his, I suppose, because he then had the administration of the Treasury Department) was under consideration, Virginia remained profoundly silent. This, however, was during the war, when the financial embarrassments of the country were extreme, and when the minds of all men were occupied with the war, and intent only on the contest with the foreign enemy; and this circumstance might suffice to account for the inattention of Virginia at that time to the project of a national bank, though she still held it to be unconstitutional, or even for any favor with which her statesmen may then have viewed it. But the charter of the present Bank of the United States was proposed and adopted in 1815-16, after the peace; proposed and adopted, I verily believe, under a sense of imperious necessity, as the only practicable means of correcting the vitiated state of the currency produced by an inundation of bank paper poured forth by the State banks, and of relieving the operations of the Treasury from continual embarrassments and disorder; and I well remember (for, knowing the public opinion on the constitutional question, I was surprised at the fact) that Virginia still remained profoundly silent. A few there were who faintly urged the constitutional objection, but the greater part of our statesmen, and the General Assembly, retained silent. My own opinion on the constitutional question was the same then that it is now, and confirmed by a very careful examination of it; but, considering it as abandoned, I was of the number of those who yet objected to the proposed charter, on the ground that the capital was too large, (larger than was necessary for its avowed purpose,) so large that the institution would become, unavoidably and indissolubly, complicated with all the financial and commercial affairs of the nation, though, in truth, the sum of thirty-five millions did not then sound to the general ear, or to my own, as by any means so vast a sum as it now appears to our perceptions. But neither did Virginia make any objection on this score. The wisest and firmest men, the most consistent and strenuous maintainers of strict construction, seemed overcome by a sense of imperious necessity; and the State, though it would not give its positive assent to the measure, yet gave it a negative support, by withdrawing its opposition. Mr. Madison, then President of the United States, gave his approbation to the charter, avowedly yielding his private opinion on the constitutional question, to the general sense of the nation. Did he thereby forfeit any portion of the esteem, the confidence, the veneration, of the people of Virginia? Mr. Crawford was a strenuous and able advocate of the renewal of the charter of the old Bank of the United States, thereby giving the weight of his authority to the latitudinous principle of construction, (as we think it,) by which alone it can be vindicated. Did not Virginia afterwards give him her zealous support for the Presidency? I gave him my vote with most hearty good will. Again, when the question concerning the re-charter of the bank was before Congress in 1832, the General Assembly of Virginia remained profoundly silent; though the constitutional question had then been revived, with what collateral views it required no wizard to understand. Sir, Virginia may now, with perfect consistency, make that choice between the alternatives that shall be presented to her, which to her wisdom shall seem good; and all I desire is, that she shall understand the alternatives—distinctly, thoroughly understand them—and calmly, deliberately, consider them. Then will her resolution be worthy of consideration, and challenge obedience.

I am as fixed in the opinion that the present bank, or any other national bank, is unconstitutional, as the gentleman from New York can possibly be. But, sir, there is a wide and obvious difference between the question, whether an act shall be done, whether a particular system shall be adopted, and the question, after the act has been done, after the system has been adopted, whether it shall be undone or reversed; and this, though the question in both cases alike may involve a point of constitutional law. The first act does not operate merely by the force of its authority as a precedent: it is an act done which cannot be recalled; which has produced effects that cannot be annihilated; a state of facts that no human power or wisdom can alter; and the actual state of affairs may render it difficult and hazardous to reverse at all the system of measures out of which it has grown, and impossible to reverse abruptly, without subverting the very frame of Government from its foundations, or making a vital change in its constitution. For instance, we know that it was the opinion of Mr. Jefferson (at least his opinion at first) that the admission of the purchased territory of Louisiana into the Union, as an integral part of the empire, was not warranted by the constitution of the United States. The Senate will not imagine that I have ever bestowed any serious care to the examination of that question. At the time of the transaction, I was not competent to the task; and the glory of extending the empire of free government over so vast a region, which won my heart, would have swayed my judgment. But suppose that, upon a deliberate examination of it now, my judgment should be fully convinced that that first opinion of Mr. Jefferson was right; does any man think, if the question should be presented to this House, whether Arkansas shall be admitted as a State into the Union, that I would, or that I ought, to raise the constitutional objection? I know very well the differences between such a question, and the question of renewal of the charter of the bank; I am only illustrating my meaning. Considerations like this I have been suggesting, must occur to all thinking men, and have their proper weight with them; and the more ardent their attachment to the Union, and the greater their loyalty to the constitution and laws, the more cautious will they be in resolving on the proper course of measures in the present conjuncture of affairs, and that yet more awful which is coming on. The very intensity of the disease often forbids an immediate resort to strong and decisive remedies.

The President tells the public that he is resolved to restore to the country a metallic medium of circulation; and though I can never agree with him that it is at all within his competency to regulate the currency, or that such a work as he proposes to himself can be accomplished immediately, at a single blow, and by a mere exertion of the will of Government, yet I so far agree with him as to think that the metallic basis, on which our system of bank paper currency rests, (I mean the whole system, State and Federal,) is altogether too narrow, and ought, by all judicious means practicable, to be widened. Of this, the recent disclosures of the condition of the State banks have convinced me; I had before no adequate idea of the state of them. Their system of credit and currency is an inverted pyramid of stupendous dimensions, resting on a support narrower than its apex; a breath can shake it—a single powerful hand can, in a moment, subvert and tumble it into ruins. But the restoration of a metallic currency, partially, to any desirable extent, much more in whole, can only be the work of legislation—wise, cautious legislation—and it must be a work of time. Any movement towards the object must proceed by slow degrees, step by step, inch by inch, hesitating at the least appearance of failure, and never moving rapidly till success shall be certain. Now, it seems to me quite plain, that a national bank may be made a far more efficient instrument than the President's league of State banks can possibly be, for gradually contracting its own paper circulation and that of the State banks, and thus for introducing a hard money currency in place of the bank paper currency that shall be drawn in; and, in the end, reducing the whole system, State and Federal, to a state in which it may easily be limited, or abolished, as experience shall dictate to be wise. And for my part, I cannot understand, and I shall be obliged to any gentleman who will have the goodness to explain to me, how it can be that Congress, and the President concurring in the act, have no constitutional power to regulate the currency through the instrumentality of a national bank, and yet that the President alone possesses a rightful constitutional prerogative to regulate the currency through the instrumentality of his league of State banks?

Yet this prerogative is exactly what he openly claims. I stated the other day, from memory, what he said on this subject to one of the committees that have recently waited on him; it was the Philadelphia committee; and I shall now read to the Senate the passage in the report of the committee to which I referred, premising that I have no reason to doubt of the accuracy of the report of twenty-two respectable witnesses.

"It was announced by the President, that he meant to continue the present system of collecting the revenue by the State banks, until the experiment had been fully tried, and, at all events, until the expiration of the charter of the United States Bank. That he had no doubt of the success of the experiment, nor that the State banks would answer all the purposes of the country; that he would furnish the country with as good, nay, a better and a more solvent currency than that of the national bank; that he had early foreseen and provided against the inclination of the Bank of the United States to crush the State banks, and that his interposition alone had saved them from ruin; that he would continue to protect the State banks by all the means in his power.

"The President admitted that considerable distress had followed the action of the Government in relation to the deposits. He had never doubted that brokers and stock speculators, and all who were doing business upon borrowed capital, would suffer severely under the effects of the measure, and that all such people ought to break.

"In reference to his declaration, that he would continue the present system of collecting the revenue through the State banks until the experiment had been fully tried, one of the delegates inquired whether he had determined upon any plan by which the country might be relieved, in case the experiment failed? His answer was, that he was disposed to be candid, and would explain his views on that point: that, in order to restore the currency to the condition intended by the constitution, and place the moneyed concerns of the country where the sages of the constitution found and left them, he proposed to put out of circulation all notes of five dollars and under, by placing the public money in such State banks as would issue no notes below ten dollars; and by forbidding the receipt, in payment of the revenue, of the notes of all banks which should issue notes under ten dollars; that the same process would next be pursued in reference to all notes under twenty dollars; and thus a metallic currency be ensured for all the common purposes of life, while the use of bank notes would be confined to those engaged in commerce.

"The same delegate having inquired when he proposed to put this plan in execution, the answer was, Not immediately—not until the expiration of the charter of the Bank of the United States. Go home, gentlemen, said he, and tell the Bank of the United States to relieve the country, by increasing its business. Let the United States Bank make no run upon the State banks, and I will take care that the State banks make no run upon her. Let the war between the banks cease, and all will be well in forty-eight hours. The Bank of the United States is trying to crush the State banks. Tell the State banks that I will protect them, and that the power of the United States Bank is nearly gone, and that it will be compelled to cease its present course."

Here, then, is a claim openly asserted by the President, of an independent Executive prerogative to regulate the currency! Here, too, is evidence of the absolute control he has acquired over the State banks, by the disposition he has made of the public treasure; of his knowledge that he has acquired it; of his actual exercise of it; of his consciousness that the State banks are dependent on him for protection! The question is not whether such a prerogative ought to be vested by law in the Executive—the President is already in the actual possession and exercise of it. He has already assumed to himself the disposition of the public revenue, between the collection and the disbursement—the right to lend these vast sums of the people's money to the State banks, in order to enable them to meet their own engagements, and to enhance their profits. What have they to pay to their benefactor and protector for his protection and favor? Nothing but obedience and loyalty. Let them, or any of them, be refractory, and he will dismiss them—ay, and crush them. He has acquired the power of acquiring as much more power as he may care to possess. It is in vain to tell us he will not abuse it. Suppose he will not; are the people of this country content to hold their public treasures, their private properties, and their liberties, by the same tenure by which his Secretaries hold their offices—during his good pleasure?

Sir, even if it could be supposed that the language which the President is reported to have held to these committees is only the language of heat and passion, and, therefore, affording no certain indication of his opinions and designs, I should be wholly unwilling that the ears of the people should be accustomed to such language. The tendency of this Government to monarchy was foretold from the beginning; and is now, I think, manifest from its history. The causes of that tendency are to be found in the circumstance that the President must always be the chief of the prevailing party, in the immense patronage he possesses, and the power it gives him to dispense rewards to his friends, honor and emolument; in the temptation he is under so to employ his patronage as to secure his own popularity and power; and in the nature of party spirit, that distinct and powerful principle of human action, which impels men to support the head of their party always, especially when their chief is in power, because thereby they maintain their own power, and an exclusive claim to official honors and emoluments. These general observations apply to the Presidential office, not the particular incumbent. And a strong proof that the Government is working according to its natural tendency, is, that the instances of it, however flagrant, often pass unnoticed.

I have heard it said a thousand times, that the present Chief Magistrate has done more for State rights than any and all of his predecessors. The first evidence of this always adduced is his veto of the bank; though he tells us, that there is another kind of national bank (what, he only knows) which he would approve; and though he has created for himself a league of State banks, more palpably unconstitutional than any national bank. And the next proof is, that he has put his veto on appropriations for internal improvement, which we of Virginia think just as unconstitutional as the bank charter. Has he, indeed? He has said that the appropriations for works of internal improvement, local in their nature, are unconstitutional; but appropriations for such works of a general nature are constitutional; and whether such works be of a local or of a general nature, it belongs not to Congress, but to the President, to judge. How he has followed this distinction in practice, I shall not now inquire. But the doctrine is neither more nor less than the assertion of a right in the Executive to permit, or to deny, appropriations for works of internal improvement, according to the judgment of the President; and the unavoidable consequence must be, that all those that want the aid of this Government for the prosecution of such works, will and must court the Presidential favor.

Great as is the addition to the influence of the Executive, which this doctrine, carried into practical execution, must produce, and obvious and glaring as the consequences of it are, I do not remember that I have ever seen any notice taken of the doctrine, in this (to my mind) the most important view of it. And there are State rights men who do really think that much has been gained for our cause, by taking away from Congress the right of appropriating money for works of internal improvement, and conceding to the Executive, in effect, the power of appropriating money to such works of the kind as he shall think improvements of a general nature!

We are perpetually told, that the bank is a potent, yet irresponsible agent—a monster of iniquity and corruption, capable to inflict every mischief, and as malignant as it is powerful. As to all this, I must say, that I have seen no charges of misconduct against the bank which were not proper subjects of judicial inquiry; that I never can take accusations for proof of guilt, or defences for proof of innocence; and that, if the crimes imputed to the bank were established to my satisfaction, I should still deny to the Executive the power to try, convict, and punish. For instance, if the President should order the most notorious and atrocious pirate to be hanged, without judge or jury, I should be surprised and shocked to hear the guilt of the sufferer alleged as an excuse, much more as a justification for the execution. And, sir, I cannot help observing, that there are some crimes imputed to the bank, of which the President himself might be convicted upon exactly the same kind of evidence on which he has pronounced sentence against the bank.

He accuses the bank of electioneering, and of corrupting the press; and the proof adduced consists in the facts, that the bank has paid large amounts to editors of public journals for printing pamphlets in its defence, and has granted accommodation, in the way of loans, to others. And this is said by the President! Will he have us believe that the employment of ministerial presses by the Departments to execute the public printing, (of the laws and the like,) and his own nomination of printers, is to be justly attributed to a design to influence their editorial conduct, and to corrupt the public press? Now, sir, I have not, myself, any disposition to condemn and proscribe the editors of public journals as a class. I know the injustice and cruelty of such general denunciations, though I do, in my heart, as every man of honor does, condemn and loathe such of them as are capable of fabricating the vilest calumnies touching the public and private relations of men, not sparing even the delicacy of the female sex, and such of them who, conscious of the truth, and ashamed to publish calumny as their own, yet reprint it from other papers, or publish it in anonymous pieces, without correction or contradiction. And I desire it may be understood, that I would not, and do not, found any charge against the President of a design to corrupt the press, on the employment, and consequent emolument, given to ministerial editors; and on his nominations of such persons for office. I can account for his conduct on other motives. But if he will insist that the employment of editors by the bank, and the accommodation given to them, is proof conclusive against the bank of a design to corrupt the public press, how can he expect that the same measure of justice will not be meted to him which he metes to others?

I repeat, that I make no inquiries into the President's motives or ultimate designs; because, in the first place, I do not think such inquiries proper for me in my legislative capacity; and because, in the next place, it has not pleased God to put that window in the human breast, suggested by the philosopher in the fable, through which men may look into each other's hearts; and I have so often seen persons, of the greatest penetration, lamentably mistaken in their estimates of the motives of others, that I, who pretend to no such penetration, am always reluctant to attempt an inquiry into men's motives. But it is just and fair and necessary to examine the opinions and designs which the President has openly avowed, to exhibit the true character of his actual conduct, and to estimate the natural and inevitable consequences.

When the debate had reached this point, Mr. CALHOUN intimated his wish to address the Senate, but as the day was advanced, he proposed an adjournment.

Mr. WEBSTER said he was entirely willing to gratify the Senator from South Carolina, but hoped many days would not be consumed in the preliminary question of granting leave.

On motion of Mr. CALHOUN,

FRIDAY, MARCH 21.

PUBLIC DISTRESS.

Mr. CLAY rose and said, he had been desirous for some days past of an opportunity of presenting to the Senate a memorial, but had not been able to do it, in consequence of the intervention of other business. It was a memorial signed by upwards of three thousand persons, clerks of mercantile men, and others engaged in trade, in the city of New York. The memorial came from a class of men embracing almost every variety of situation; men, old and young, married men and single men. The majority of these men are without capital or property of any kind, other than that probity, industry, and public confidence, which obtains for them business, and the others are men of small capital. The memorial came from a class of men which, he was informed, was highly intelligent and respectable. They did not pronounce their opinion on the causes which have produced the distress and pecuniary embarrassment, of which daily and hourly such afflicting evidence is received; but they bear testimony to the existence of that distress, of which nobody doubts. They pray Congress to afford such remedy as the urgency of the case demands. The paper was not long, Mr. C. said, and he would take the liberty to read it for the information of the Senate.

[Here Mr. CLAY read the memorial.]

While up, Mr. C. said, as it was somewhat difficult, owing to the number of petitions in the hands of gentlemen, to get an opportunity to present one to the Senate, he would present another petition on the same subject, and would move that both the memorials be referred at the same time. This second memorial was from a large number of traders from as many as ten different States in the valley of the Mississippi, who happened lately to be in Philadelphia, where they were called in the course of their business, for the purpose of laying in their stock of goods for the season. These men were engaged in every variety of trade, were of every political party, though they give no political character to their memorial. Many of these gentlemen came from his, Mr. C.'s, own State, and with many of them he was well acquainted; and, from all the information in his possession, he was gratified to say, they were intelligent, highly respectable, and of character and standing in society. They were men whose course of business makes them well informed of the condition of affairs in the section of country they come from. They find that the state of exchange greatly embarrasses their business, and makes them exceedingly anxious for the future. The meeting was altogether promiscuous, was assembled accidentally, and the memorial was agreed on with perfect unanimity of sentiment. As it was, like the New York memorial, also a short one, Mr. C. said he would also take the liberty of reading it himself.

[Mr. CLAY then read the memorial.]

He intended to avail himself of this opportunity, Mr. C. said, to make some remarks on the subject-matter of this paper; but, as he knew that another subject was about to be taken up, on which some gentlemen were prepared to address the Senate, he would content himself with one single remark—that, with the warmest feelings of an American bosom, with those sensations which every man must feel who sees the ruin which threatens the country, he still thought it was the first, the main duty of Congress, to replace the authority of the laws of the country, and that then, and not till then, it would be proper to make legislative provisions for affording to a suffering people that relief which their condition required.

Mr. C. then moved that the memorials be referred to the Committee on Finance, and that they be printed; which motion was carried.

NEW JERSEY MEMORIALS.

Mr. SOUTHARD presented five memorials: one from three of the banks of New Jersey, and the others from the counties of Monmouth, Gloucester, and Hunterdon, in the same State, complaining of the pecuniary embarrassments of the country, which they attribute to the removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States, and praying for their restoration, with such other measure of relief as Congress may devise. The memorialists also express the opinion that the instructions given by the legislature of New Jersey to their Senators in Congress, were not warranted by the sense of the people of that State, a vast majority of whom were opposed to them.

On the presentation of these memorials—

Mr. SOUTHARD said: The first memorial is signed by about thirty respectable and intelligent inhabitants of the township of Lawrence, in the county of Hunterdon. It was intended to form a part of the memorial presented some time since, from Trenton and its vicinity, and expresses the same views as those contained in that memorial respecting the act of the Executive in removing the deposits.

The second is a memorial from a part of the inhabitants of Monmouth county, of a like character, and intended to accompany that from the county of Burlington.

The third is from Shrewsbury, in Monmouth. A meeting was held on the 10th of February, at which resolutions were passed, which declare that the removal of the deposits was a violation of the bank charter—premature, inexpedient, and productive of most disastrous consequences—that the control of the people's money belongs exclusively to Congress, and that the President assumed a power not delegated to him—that, without speedy and efficient relief, there will be a general bankruptcy of the great mass of men of business, and it can only be averted by a restoration of the deposits—that the Senators of the State merit their thanks for their republican conduct in listening to the voice of the people in preference to the resolves of a party State legislature—which, in giving the instructions, took upon themselves an authority not given to them by their constituents. The memorial expresses the same opinions; and they declare their belief that a large majority of the inhabitants of New Jersey are decidedly opposed to the instructions of the legislature. The individual who communicates the memorial, expresses the belief that three-fourths of the people would have signed it, if it had been presented to them. This county is represented in the legislature by those who voted for the instructions.

The fourth is a joint memorial of three banks in New Jersey: the State Bank at Camden, in Gloucester, the Farmers' Bank at Mount Holly, in Burlington, and the Cumberland Bank at Bridgetown, in Cumberland county. They are the only banks, I believe, below Trenton, in West Jersey, except one, which stopped payment about two months since. Its present condition I do not know. They are all of them in good credit at this time, and, so far as I am informed, have maintained their credit, at all times, and are skillfully and prudently managed, by men of integrity and intelligence, who perfectly comprehend the state of the currency of the country, the causes which have produced its present derangement, and are good judges of the appropriate remedy. Their intercourse and accounts, out of the State, are principally with the city of Philadelphia, and the banking institutions there. This memorial was sent here, in a letter dated 15th February, 1834, and was received two or three weeks since. My absence for a few days, and other unavoidable circumstances, have prevented the prompt attention to it which its merits demand, and my own respect for those whose names are signed to it, would secure. They declare that a state of unprecedented embarrassment and pressure exists in the community, which, unless timely relieved, is likely to produce extensive distress and ruin—that the cause is to be found "in the withdrawal of the deposits" and the hostile attitude assumed by the Government towards the Bank of the United States, and they firmly believe that the restoration of the deposits "would produce immediate and effectual relief;" and they pray that the money, now in the State banks, may remain until withdrawn in the course of the public service, but that hereafter the accruing public revenue should be deposited in the Bank of the United States.

New Jersey Memorials.

The opinions of these gentlemen merit respect. They are intelligent and upright. These banks probably feel the effects of the present condition of things as others do, and not more severely than others. They are country banks, and have their dealings very much with the ordinary business of the country, and are affected as that business is affected. They feel when the people of the country feel. I am not personally and particularly acquainted with their peculiar condition, as to solvency and extent of business, but as I know the circumstances of one similar institution, which acts as they do, and which I believe is as solvent and safe as any other, I think it proper to state some facts in regard to it, in connexion with this memorial. The bank to which I allude had, on the first of November, an amount of specie large in proportion to its capital and circulation, much larger than many others, and the means to supply itself, promptly, with specie to any amount short of its capital, so long as specie was to be obtained by any of the solvent banks in the cities of Philadelphia and New York. At that period, about the 1st of November, or previous thereto, in October, the operation commenced of calling on it for specie in small sums, and it has continued, so that on the first of March, it had lost about $30,000 in specie, which it had, as far as was necessary for its interests, replaced, taking care to keep itself always ready for any call which might be made upon it. This specie was all taken in small sums of from twenty, up to five and eight hundred dollars. None of it was drawn by any other bank, and very little of it, if any, for active use or speculation. It was taken by farmers and others, who, having lost confidence in bank paper, and not in this more, and I believe not so much, as in other banks, but who desired to hoard up the specie for times which they feared were approaching. Now, several inferences seem to me to result from these facts, and I state them for the consideration of the Senate.

1. The operation commenced in October and November. It was not, therefore, the result of any panic, created by speeches in this Hall, or in the other—not the effect of the eloquence, which has been supposed, by certain members of the Senate, and by others, to have bewildered the understandings of the people—an effect certainly greater than any one of those gentlemen who have spoken, would be disposed to attribute to his own powers—an effect which, if it be true, ought to elevate the speakers here to an unrivalled station in oratory. I do not believe in this cause assigned for the panic, and especially as the effect was produced, in this instance, some month or six weeks before the cause existed—before the speeches were made.

2. I cannot believe that the panic was the effect of party intrigue, movement, or discipline. The men who withdrew this specie were of all parties, not more, I believe, of the opponents than the friends of the administration. They are farmers, and other retired men, little busied in political schemes—the last society who would be affected by political schemers; and, I should think, the last who would create or promote a plan which would inevitably injure their own interests, for the purpose of making an experiment, to see if they could not overthrow an administration, of which many of them were the supporters. Whatever partisans, in the excitement of politics, and on the actual theatre of conflict, may be willing to do—however they, or leaders who may have selfish purposes to accomplish, may agree to make sacrifices, and let credit and commerce and State institutions perish, and subject themselves to the humblest fare for life, rather than, by retracing an erroneous plan of policy, hazard loss of popularity and influence, or break the bonds of party—however they may be willing to do this, it cannot be possible that such men as those to whom I have referred would move in such a manner, on such a subject, from any such motive. They look to their own interest and security, and they withdraw the gold and silver, and lock it up, for one reason only—they have lost confidence in the circulation of the country, and are determined to be safe themselves from the approaching confusion and evils of a currency which has been rendered insecure by a disregard of the law which protects it.

3. This effect could not have been produced, as I can perceive, by the action of the Bank of the United States in any curtailment, or any pressure which it has made. Not a dollar of this specie has been drawn by that bank, nor a dollar of it, I suppose, gone to that bank; nor has it been drawn by other banks, or been used to pay debts to banks. Much the larger part of it is now, probably, under lock and key, in the trunks and desks of the owners. The bank of which I speak was not in a situation to be pressed by other banks—it was a creditor, rather than a debtor.

The effect of this state of things is apparent. This specie is withdrawn from the circulation of the country. It is not in a situation to perform the ordinary duties of the currency, in the ordinary operations of business; and the pressure must be felt just so far as the sudden withdrawal of this amount from the active circulation of a small district of country would at any time be felt. Those Senators who have made themselves conversant with the amount of the circulating medium in any given district, can estimate the severe pressure which would be produced by such withdrawal, and will readily satisfy themselves that the pressure on the business and occupations of men would not be small—a mere idle fancy—raised by the workings of political managers. But this is by no means the extent of the evil. It is not the specie alone which has been withdrawn. The bank discounted on that specie, to two, three, perhaps five times its amount, and was justified in so doing. When it lost the specie, it had, as a matter not of mere prudence, but of necessity, to retire a proportionate amount of its notes, and lock them up also in the vaults of the bank. It did so, and curtailed its circulation, more, I believe, than 100,000 dollars. And it did this, not from mere panic—not because it feared that the Bank of the United States would draw upon it, for that bank had not the means at the time to do this—not because it desired to subserve party purposes—it is subject to no such operation. If influenced at all, heretofore, by political feelings, it has been in a different direction. Its officers and acts have rather been in favor of the existing administration and its friends than otherwise. But it has done it, with perfect propriety, as matter of necessity and duty, because the means on which it made its issues have been taken away, and honesty and a regard for its own safety required the curtailment. The effect of withdrawing 100,000 dollars from the circle of operations of a small State bank, need not be explained by me. The consequences are apparent, in the difficulty of complying with contracts, in the impossibility of procuring active funds to carry on the ordinary operations of society, and paying labor its reward. We may shut our eyes to these consequences, and disregard them, in the hope of political triumph, or in devotion to the objects of party ambition; but they are now felt, and will continue to be felt, with agony, by an injured, wronged, and suffering people.

Mr. President, the cause about which we dispute, day by day, is, not, in the instance to which I allude, to be found in any thing but want of confidence in the circulating medium of the country, and in its capacity to bear the burden which has been laid upon it—to meet with solid capital, sound specie, the claims which may be made against it. What has produced this want of confidence? The withdrawing of a comparatively small amount of its accommodations by the Bank of the United States? Would these men have felt that curtailment? Did they from this cause present these notes to have them changed into specie, that they might hoard up that specie? No, sir; it was produced by their perceiving that the Executive had, against law, determined to destroy that bank; that it must be hastily wound up, under the worst of all possible circumstances for its own benefit and that of those who had dealings with and were indebted to it—that this must create confusion and distress in the community; and when it was destroyed, there would remain no efficient control over the other banks; but that they would be tempted to enlarge their issues beyond their means, and thus become unsafe, and re-produce the horrid effects which they well remembered existed less than twenty years ago, throughout the whole nation. They lost their faith in the notes which they held; they would hold them no longer; and, for every dollar of specie which they hoarded, they abstracted four or five from the circulation of their neighborhood. The cause is to be found in the act of the Government. The Executive produced it—it was commenced by him—but it has been continued, because the legislature has not asserted its constitutional privileges; has not compelled, by its constitutional action, the Executive to retrace its errors. The guilt now lies here as well as there. Sir, the evil must continue until the law has its true course—until its majesty is vindicated. The hand of power can destroy confidence in the currency; its mandate cannot restore that confidence. Its usurpations may make the holder of specie place it in safe custody: its orders, or party discipline, or personal popularity, however overwhelming in other matters, cannot release that specie from its custody. Confidence may be overthrown by violations of law; it can only be recalled by the encroachments upon law being repaired, and its authority sustained.

The fifth memorial which I have to present, is on the same subject. It is signed by 1,695 inhabitants, and, I am informed, voters of the county of Gloucester, in New Jersey. Its history and contents deserve notice. On the 10th February last there was a meeting of the inhabitants of Woolwich township. A resolution was passed there to call a meeting of the county. This county meeting was held only five days afterwards, on the 15th. It was very numerous; and, if I may judge from my information and the names mentioned in the proceedings, as respectable in character as any which has ever been held, at any time, on any subject, within that county. I have before stated to the Senate the general character of the population of that part of the State. A large portion of it is but little disposed to mingle in party strifes, or partake in elections, except when they feel some great and pressing present object of public interest to be accomplished; or some important principle to be sustained. And this arises, not from any want of patriotic feeling, of devotion to the principles of liberty and just government—for in these they are inferior to none—but from a tone of religious feeling and opinion, which disinclines them to partake in political controversies. When they are moved, they feel and act from a deep sense of duty. This meeting resolved, that the removal of the deposits from the place directed by law, and more especially at a period immediately preceding the meeting of Congress, was without just cause; a manifest abuse of power, and in disregard of the interest and will of the country; that the country is suffering great and increasing distress, arising from derangement of the currency, and the failure of public confidence consequent upon that removal; that their Senators and Representatives be requested to use their exertions to have the deposits restored, as a means of relief and restoring confidence; that the instructions of the legislature were not in accordance with the sentiments of their constituents; and that the Senators and Representatives ought not, under such circumstances, to be bound thereby; that the course of my colleague and myself meets their decided approbation, and we are requested to persevere in it. They further resolved that it was inexpedient to pass resolutions on the important question of re-chartering the bank, as the meeting was called solely in reference to the removal of the deposits. They further prepared a memorial, and appointed five persons in each township to present it for signatures. This memorial conveys the same views as the resolutions. The period of five days only was fixed for obtaining signatures. The county is very large, extending entirely across the State, and, in some parts of it, the population is thin and scattered. Some of the copies of the memorial did not reach the persons designated until the time had expired, and no effort was made by them to procure signers. Under all these circumstances, the signatures amount to 1,695. In the Congressional election of 1832, by which all the members from New Jersey in the House of Representatives hold their seats, the highest Jackson candidate received 1,618 votes, being 77 less than the number of signatures so obtained in the short period mentioned, and in such a community. In the county election for members of the legislature, in 1833, by which the members who instructed us were elected, the highest Jackson man received only 1,477, being less, by 218, than the number who have now directed us to disobey those instructions, and approved our course—not the course of the Secretary of the Treasury. And it is apparent, if the memorialists had taken longer time, and presented it to all, the number would have been greatly increased, and probably doubled. I am assured, by the member of the committee who forwarded the memorials, that such is his opinion. He adds, that they contain “the names of a large number of Jackson men of the county, and among them some of the most influential and respectable of the party, with whom he is personally acquainted, and he does not doubt that very many of equal standing among them, with whom he is not acquainted, have also signed them.”

These memorials, Mr. President, and others which have been presented from Burlington and Cumberland, and other places, raise a question of no ordinary importance to my colleague and myself—one which has not escaped the notice of either the public or the Senate—which has been several times alluded to in debate, in such mode, as was regarded by many as calling upon us for an answer to the remarks which were made. We did not choose to be thus drawn into the defence of our conduct before this tribunal. There is another, before which we shall meet, most cheerfully, our accusers, and as cheerfully abide the verdict and the judgment which shall be rendered after the hearing, so far as they shall affect us personally, however we may feel for the laws and institutions of our country. That tribunal is the people of New Jersey, whom we solemnly believe, and think we have abundant evidence for our belief, were not correctly represented in those instructions. For their deliberate opinions, and wishes, and interests, we probably entertain quite as sincere and heartfelt a regard, as those who more frequently have the word people, people, upon their tongues. We prefer to be tested by acts rather than professions. It is not my purpose to fatigue the Senate by any exposition of my understanding of the nature and extent of the right and doctrine of instructions, to be given by State legislatures to Senators or Representatives. When circumstances and the occasion shall call for an exposition of my opinion, it will not be evaded. But there is a remark or two due to this occasion, not merely in its effect upon my colleague and myself, but upon the Senate. The popular opinion of the country is of importance in our action upon the great questions before us. They must eventually be decided, or the decision sustained or reversed by the people. They are not such questions as may or can be forgotten, after the agitations of the moment have passed by. Both in their political and financial aspect, they must operate too strongly on the interests of the people to produce no future and permanent effect. It is important, therefore, for us to know what the people, much more than what partisan and political leaders think. When the instructions of the legislature of New Jersey were received, her Senators honestly and sincerely believed that those instructions did not convey the opinions of the people of that State. They were not anticipated—they occasioned great surprise. It was known that the nominations of candidates for the legislature had been made before, and the elections had taken place within ten or twelve days after the Executive had removed the deposits—too soon for the people to have received the information, and formed their deliberate opinion upon the question; and at a time when it was impossible for the voters to know or guess what the opinions of the candidates were, unless upon the humiliating and insulting presumption, that their judgments and consciences were in the keeping of the Executive, and they were prepared to sustain, for party purposes, any and every measure which he should direct—a presumption which, I suppose, the people were not willing to entertain, and which, for them, I feel safe in disavowing. Those elected, therefore, were chosen without being themselves instructed by, or knowing, the opinions of their constituents. There was another cause of surprise to us. It had been stated, how truly I do not affirm, that some of those who voted for the instructions had declared that it was too much to require of them to sustain such a measure, and that the belief was entertained that a majority of the members were opposed, in opinion, to the act of the Executive. If there be any foundation in truth for this, it surely ought not to be cause of censure on us that we have not received the new lights which converted others, and have not the same facility in changing ground, or facing to the right about. I was, sir, entirely satisfied that the legislature was in error, in regard to popular opinion; and I offer these memorials and others to the Senate, as evidence of the fact. The constituents of several of those who voted for the instructions have given such proof as leaves no doubt on my own mind, and others seem about to do the same thing. I am convinced that a great majority of the people of New Jersey condemn the act of the Executive; and if I am in error, a very large and respectable portion of my constituents have contributed to lead me into that error. I must abide the issue of my opinion, let it be favorable or adverse. It will be their duty, at the polls, to confirm the information which they have communicated. In this state of facts, it is not a question of the right of instruction under our system, but a very different one—and that is this: When a Senator is perfectly satisfied that the instructions which he receives from the legislature are opposed to the opinions and wishes of the people, is he bound to obey them, and thereby violate the opinions and wishes of his constituents? I know that this has been recently affirmed, but I am aware of no principle in our Government—of no doctrine of any school of politicians, in this country, of a date older than five years, which would require an affirmative answer to this question. Is it true that the legislature has a right, in disregard of popular opinion, and against the wishes of their own constituents, to control the other agents of those constituents? Is the power vested in the legislature, on this point, independent of the people of the State? Are they, in that, the masters of the people? I had supposed that the people were the source of power—that their will was as controlling, in its action, on their members of the legislature on this subject as on any other—and that their commands were only to be regarded as valid, when they conformed to the instructions and commands of their constituents. This may be sophism; but I beg to say, that it is old republicanism and democracy—not that of modern duty, which seems to require that the will of a few who happen to be in a legislature, or are leaders of a party, should be obeyed, in despite of the opinions and wishes of the people. Sir, believing, as I do, that my constituents disapprove the act of the Executive, I should be guilty of treason towards them if I obeyed the orders of others, in approving that act, against my own judgment.

I offer these memorials to the Senate, as evidence of the opinions of the people of New Jersey—to have the weight to which they are entitled, on this agitating subject. And I merely add my strong conviction, that a large majority disapprove the conduct of the Executive in violating the laws and constitution of the country; and anxiously desire from Congress that relief which the Executive denies.

The memorials were then, on motion of Mr. S., referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

MARYLAND MEMORIALS.

Mr. KENT said he had been requested to present to the Senate, memorials from four banks, located in the western part of the State of Maryland, three of them in Frederick city, and one in Williamsport, in Washington county. Those from Frederick city were silent on the subject of the removal of the deposits, though decidedly in favor of the re-charter of the Bank of the United States.

These memorials are couched in respectful language, and I beg leave to state to the Senate that the subscribers to them are gentlemen of acknowledged intelligence and of great worth and respectability of character; possessing much experience in their line of business, intimately acquainted with the interests of their surrounding country, and the feelings that pervade its population. These memorialists have been conducting for years banks of as much solidity as any in the State, located in a rich and fertile country, in the midst of a population proverbial for their skilful, unremitted industry and great frugality; and be assured, Mr. President, they would scorn to come here with any complaints, either on their own account or that of their enterprising countrymen, unless they had been made to feel the pressure that now overshadows our land, and deeply feel it too. They depict in strong colors the daily increasing distress with which they are surrounded. They deeply deplore it, without the ability to relieve it, and they ascribe their condition to the derangement of the currency, and a total want of confidence, not only between man and man, but between banks situated even in the same neighborhood—all proceeding, as they believe, from the removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States. Four months since, and the counties from whence these memorials proceed, presented a population as contented and prosperous as could be found in any section of the country. But, sir, in that short period, the picture is reversed. Their rich and productive lands, which last fall were sought after with avidity at high prices, they inform us, have fallen 25 per cent., and no purchasers are to be found even at that reduced price. Wheat, the staple of that region of the country, was never much lower, if as low. Flour is quoted in Alexandria at $3 75, where a large portion of their crops seeks a market. These honest, industrious people cannot withstand the cruel and ruinous consequences of this desperate and unnecessary experiment. The country cannot bear it, and unless speedy relief is afforded, the result of it will be as disastrous to those who projected it, as to the country at large, who are afflicted with it. Sir, this experiment, as it is called, reminds me of an observation made by a Scotch writer of some celebrity, some years since, on the British currency question. He remarked, "that the circulating credit of a community was a vital part of its social system, and the application of rash schemes, for the purpose of improving it, was something like making experiments upon the lungs of a man—if the patient be not killed by the experiment, the danger of increasing the disease would be at least as great as the chance of mending his constitution." Mr. K. said he regretted that he should have to address the Senate in his feeble state of health, and still more feeble voice.

Mr. K. then moved that the memorials be referred to the Committee on Finance and printed; which was carried.

RE-CHARTERING BANK UNITED STATES.

The VICE PRESIDENT now announced the first special order to be the granting leave to introduce a bill to re-charter the Bank of the United States; when

Mr. CALHOUN rose and addressed the Chair as follows:

I rise, said Mr. C., in order to avail myself of an early opportunity to express my opinion on the measure proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, and the questions immediately connected with it, on the ground that, on a subject so immediately connected with the interests of every class in the community, there should be an early declaration of their sentiments by the members of this body, so that all might know what to expect, and on what to calculate.

I shall vote for the motion of the Senator, not because I approve of the measure he proposes, but because I consider it due, in courtesy, to grant leave, unless there be strong reasons to the contrary, which is not the case in this instance; but while I am prepared to vote for his motion, and, let me add, to do ample justice to his motives for introducing the bill, I cannot approve of the measure he proposes. In every view which I have been able to take, it is objectionable. Among the objections, I place the uncertainty as to its object. It is left perfectly open to conjecture, whether a renewal of the charter is intended, or a mere continuance with the view of affording the bank time to wind up its affairs; and what increases the uncertainty is, if we compare the provisions of the proposed bill with the one or the other of these objects, it is equally unsuited to either. If a renewal of the charter be intended, six years is too short; if a continuance, too long. I, however, state this as a mere minor objection. There is another of far more decisive character; it settles nothing, it leaves every thing unfixed—it perpetuates the present struggle which so injuriously agitates the country—a struggle of bank against bank—of one set of opinions against another; and prolongs the whole, without even an intervening armistice, to the year 1842—a period that covers two Presidential terms, and, by inevitable consequence, running, for two successive Presidential elections, the politics of the country into the bank question, and the bank question into politics, with the mutual corruption which must be engendered; and, during the whole period, keeping the currency of the country, which the public interest requires should have the utmost stability, in a state of uncertainty and fluctuation.

But why should I pursue the objections to the plan proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER.] He himself acknowledges the measure to be defective, and that he would prefer one of a more permanent character. He has not proposed this as the best measure, but has brought it forward under a supposed necessity—under the impression that something must be done—something prompt and immediate—to relieve the existing distress which overspreads the land. I concur with him in relation to the distress—that it is deep and extensive; that it fell upon us suddenly, and in the midst of prosperity almost unexampled; that it is daily consigning hundreds to poverty and misery, blasting the hopes of the enterprising, taking employment and bread from the laborer, and working a fearful change in the relative condition of the moneyed man and the money dealer on one side, and the man of business and the man of property on the other—taking up the former rapidly to the top of the wheel, whilst it is whirling the latter, with equal rapidity, to the bottom. While I thus agree with the Senator as to the distress, I am also sensible that there are great public emergencies in which no permanent relief can be afforded, and when the wisest are obliged to resort to expedients; to palliate and to temporize in order to gain time, with a view to apply a more effectual remedy; but there are also emergencies of precisely the opposite character; when the best and most permanent is the only practical measure; and when mere expedients tend but to distract, to divide and confound, and thereby to delay or defeat all relief; and such, viewed in all its relations and bearing, I consider the present; and that the Senator from Massachusetts has not also so considered it, I attribute to the fact that, of the two questions blended in the subject under consideration, he has given an undue prominence to that which has by far the least relative importance; I mean the questions of the bank and of the currency. As a mere bank question, as viewed by the Senator, it would be a matter of but little importance whether the renewal should be for six years or for a longer period; and a preference might very probably be given to one or the other as it might be supposed most likely to succeed; but I must say, that in my opinion, in selecting the period of six years, he has taken that which will be much less likely to succeed than one of a reasonable and proper duration. But had he turned his view to the other and more prominent question involved, had he regarded the question as a question of currency, and that the great point was to give it uniformity, permanency, and safety; that in effecting these essential objects the bank is a mere subordinate agent, to be used or not to be used, and to be modified as to its duration and other provisions wholly in reference to the higher question of the currency, I cannot think that he would ever have proposed the measure which he has brought forward, which leaves, as I have already said, every thing connected with the subject in a state of uncertainty and fluctuation.

All feel that the currency is a delicate subject, requiring to be touched with the utmost caution; but in order that it may be seen, as well as felt, why it is so delicate, why slight touches, either in depressing or elevating it, agitate and convulse the whole community, I will pause to explain the cause. If we take the aggregate property of a community, that which forms the currency constitutes, in value, a very small proportion of the whole. What this proportion is in our country and other commercial and trading communities, is somewhat uncertain. I speak conjecturally in fixing it as one to twenty-five or thirty, though I presume that is not far from the truth; and yet this small proportion of the property of the community regulates the value of all the rest, and forms the medium of circulation by which all its exchanges are effected; bearing, in this respect, a striking similarity, considering the diversity of the subjects, to the blood in the human or animal system.

If we turn our attention to the laws which govern the circulation, we shall find one of the most important to be, that, as the circulation is decreased or increased, the rest of the property will, all other circumstances remaining the same, be decreased or increased in value exactly in the same proportion. To illustrate: If a community should have an aggregate amount of property of thirty-one millions of dollars, of which one million constitutes its currency; if that one million be reduced one-tenth part, that is to say, one hundred thousand dollars, the value of the rest will be reduced in like manner one-tenth part, that is, three millions of dollars. And here a very important fact discloses itself, which explains why the currency should be touched with such delicacy, and why stability and uniformity are such essential qualities; I mean, that a small absolute reduction of the currency makes a great absolute reduction of the value of the entire property of the community, as we see in the case supposed; where a reduction of one hundred thousand dollars in the currency reduces the aggregate value of property three millions of dollars, a sum thirty times greater than the reduction of the currency. From this results an important consideration. If we suppose the entire currency to be in the hands of one portion of the community, and the property in the hands of the other portion, the former, by having the currency in their possession, might control the value of all the property of the community, and possess themselves of it at their pleasure. Take the case already selected, and suppose that those who hold the currency diminish it one-half by abstracting it from circulation; the effect of which would be, to reduce the circulation to five hundred thousand dollars; the value of property would also be reduced one-half, that is, fifteen millions of dollars. Let the process be reversed, and the money abstracted gradually restored to circulation, and the value of the property would again be increased to thirty millions. It must be obvious, that by alternating these processes, and purchasing at the point of the greatest depression when the circulation is the least, and selling at the point of the greatest elevation when it is the fullest, the supposed moneyed class, who could at pleasure increase or diminish the circulation, by abstracting or restoring it, might also at pleasure control the entire property of the country. Let it be ever borne in mind, that the exchangeable value of the circulating medium, compared with the property and the business of the community, remains fixed, and can never be diminished or increased by increasing or diminishing its quantity; while, on the contrary, the exchangeable value of the property compared to the currency, must increase or decrease with every addition or diminution of the latter. It results from this, that there is a dangerous antagonist relation between those who hold or command the currency and the rest of the community; but, fortunately for the country, the holders of property and of the currency are so blended as not to constitute separate classes. Yet, it is worthy of remark—it deserves strongly to attract the attention of those who have charge of the public affairs—that under the operation of the banking system, and that particular distribution of property existing in the shape of credit or stocks, public and private, which so strikingly distinguishes modern society from all that preceded it, there is a strong tendency to create a separate moneyed interest, accompanied with all the dangers which must necessarily result from such separation, which deserves to be most carefully watched and resisted.

Re-chartering Bank United States.

I do not stand here the partisan of any particular class in society—the rich or the poor, the property-holder or the money-holder; and, in making these remarks, I am not actuated by the slightest feeling of opposition to the latter. My object is simply to point out important relations that exist between them, resulting from the laws which govern the currency, in order that the necessity for a uniform, stable, and safe currency, to guard against dangerous control of one class over another, may be clearly seen. I stand in my place simply as a Senator from South Carolina, to represent her on this floor, and to advance the common interest of the State, as far as we have the constitutional power, and as far as it can be done consistently with equity and justice to the parts. I am the partisan, as I have said, of no class, nor, let me add, of any political party. I am neither of the opposition nor of the administration. If I act with the former in any instance, it is because I approve of their course on the particular occasion; and I shall always be happy to act with them when I do approve. If I oppose the administration—if I desire to see power change hands—it is because I disapprove of the general course of those in authority; because they have departed from the principles on which they came into office; because, instead of using the immense power and patronage put in their hands to secure the liberty of the country, and advance the public good, they have perverted them into party instruments for personal objects. But mine has not been, nor will it be, a systematic opposition. Whatever measure of theirs I may deem right, I shall cheerfully support; and I only desire that they shall afford me more frequent occasions for support and fewer for opposition, than they have heretofore done.

With these impressions, and entertaining a deep conviction that an unfixed, unstable, and fluctuating currency is to be ranked among the most fruitful sources of evil, whether viewed politically or in reference to the business transactions of the country, I cannot give my consent to any measure that does not place the currency on a solid foundation. If I thought this determination would delay the relief so necessary to mitigate the present calamity, it would be to me a subject of the deepest regret. I feel that sympathy, which I trust I ought, for the suffering of so many of my fellow-citizens, who see their hopes daily withered; I, however, console myself with the reflection that delay will not be the result, but, on the contrary, relief will be hastened, by the view which I take of the subject. I hold it impossible that any thing can be effected regarding the subject as a mere bank question. Viewed in that light, the opinions of this House, and of the other branch of Congress, are probably definitively made up. In the Senate, it is known that we have three parties, whose views, considering it as a bank question, appear to be irreconcilable. All hope, then, of relief, must centre in taking a more elevated view, and in considering it in its true light, as a subject of currency. Thus regarded, I shall be surprised if, on full investigation, there will not appear a remarkable coincidence of opinion, even between those whose views, on a slight inspection, would seem to be contradictory. Let us then proceed to the investigation of the subject under the aspect which I have proposed.

What, then, is the currency of the United States? What its present state and condition? These are the questions which I propose now to consider, with a view of ascertaining what is the disease? what the remedy, and what the means of applying it, that may be necessary to restore our currency to a sound condition?

The legal currency of this country—that in which alone debts can be discharged according to law, are certain gold, silver, and copper coins, coined at the mint of the United States, and issued by their authority, under an express provision of the constitution. Such is the law. What now are the facts? That the currency consists almost exclusively of bank notes; gold having entirely disappeared, and silver in a great measure, expelled by banks instituted by twenty-five distinct and independent powers, and notes issued under the authority of the direction of those institutions. They are, in point of fact, the mint of the United States. They coin the actual money, (for such we must call bank notes,) and regulate its issue and consequently its value. If we inquire as to their number, the amount of their issue, and other circumstances calculated to show their actual condition, we shall find that, so rapid has been their increase, and so various their changes, that no accurate information can be had. According to the latest and best that I have been able to ascertain, they number at least four hundred and fifty, with a capital of not less than one hundred and forty-five millions of dollars, with an issue exceeding seventy millions; and the whole of this immense fabric standing upon a metallic currency of less than fifteen millions of dollars, of which the greater part is held by the Bank of the United States. If we compare the notes in circulation with the metallic currency in their vaults, we shall find the proportion about six to one; and if we compare the latter with the demands that may be made upon the banks, we shall find that the proportion is about one to eleven. If we examine the tendency of the system at this moment, we shall find that it is on the increase—rapidly on the increase. There is now pending a project of a ten million bank before the legislature of New York; but recently one of five millions was established in Kentucky; within a short period one of a large capital was established in Tennessee; besides others in agitation in several of the other States. [Here Mr. PORTER, of Louisiana, said that one of eleven millions had just been established in that State.]

This increase is not accidental. It may be laid down as a law, that where two currencies are permitted to circulate in any country, one of a cheap and the other of a dear material, the former necessarily intends to grow upon the latter, and will ultimately expel it from circulation, unless its tendency to increase be restrained by a powerful and efficient check. Experience tests the truth of this remark, as the history of the banking system clearly illustrates. The Senator from Massachusetts truly said that the Bank of England was derived from that of Amsterdam, as ours in turn are from that of England. Throughout its progress, the truth of what I have stated to be a law of the system is strongly evinced. The Bank of Amsterdam was merely a bank of deposit—a store-house for the safe-keeping of the bullion and precious metals brought into that commercial metropolis, through all the channels of its widely-extended trade. It was placed under the custody of the city authorities: and, on the deposit, a certificate was issued as evidence of the fact, which was transferable, so as to entitle the holder to demand the return. An important fact was soon disclosed; that a large portion of the deposits might be withdrawn, and that the residue would be sufficient to meet the returning certificates; or, what is the same in effect, that certificates might be issued without making a deposit. This suggested the idea of a bank of discount as well as deposit. The fact thus disclosed fell too much in with the genius of the system to be lost, and, accordingly, when transplanted to England, it suggested the idea of a bank of discount and of deposit; the very essence of which form of banking, that on which their profit depends, consists in issuing a greater amount of notes than it has of specie in its vaults. But the system its regularly progressing under the impulse of the laws that govern it, from its present form to a mere paper machine—a machine for fabricating and issuing notes, not convertible into specie. Already has it once reached this condition, both in England and the United States, and from which it has been forced back, in both, to a redemption of its notes, with great difficulty.

This natural tendency of the system is accelerated in our country by peculiar causes, which have greatly increased its progress. There are two powerful causes in operation. The one resulting from that rivalry which must ever take place in States situated as ours are, under one General Government, and having a free and open commercial intercourse. The introduction of the banking system in one State necessarily, on this principle, introduces it into all the others, of which we have seen a striking illustration on the part of Virginia and some of the other Southern States, which entertained, on principle, strong aversion to the system; yet they were compelled, after a long and stubborn resistance, to yield their objections, or permit their circulation to be furnished by the surrounding States, at the expense of their own capital and commerce. The same cause which thus compels one State to imitate the example of another, in introducing the system from self-defence, will compel the other States in like manner and from the same cause, to enlarge and give increased activity to the banking operation, whenever any one of the States sets the example of so doing on its part; and thus, by mutual action and reaction, the whole system is rapidly accelerated to the final destiny which I have assigned.

This is strikingly exemplified in the rapid progress of the system since its first introduction into our country. At the adoption of our constitution, a period of forty-five years, there were but three banks in the United States, the amount of whose capital I do not now recollect, but it was very small. In this short space they have increased to four hundred and fifty, with a capital of one hundred and forty-five millions, as has already been stated—an increase exceeding nearly a hundred-fold the proportionate increase of our wealth and population, as great as they have been.

But it is not in numbers only that they have increased; there has in the same time been a rapid advance in the proportion which their notes in circulation bear to the specie in their vaults. Some twenty or thirty years ago it was not considered safe for the issues to exceed the specie by more than two and a half or three for one; but now, taking the whole and including the Bank of the United States with the State banks, the proportion is about six to one, and excluding that bank, it would very greatly exceed that proportion. This increase of paper in proportion to metal, results from a cause which deserves much more notice than it has heretofore attracted. It originates mainly in the number of the banks. I will proceed to illustrate it.

The Senator from New York, [Mr. WRIGHT,] in assigning his reasons for believing the Bank of the United States to be more dangerous than those of the States, said that one bank was more dangerous than many. That, in some respects, may be true; but in one, and that a most important one, it is strikingly the opposite; I mean in the tendency of the system to increase. Where there is but one bank, the tendency to increase is not near so strong as where there are many, as illustrated in England, where the system has advanced much less rapidly, in proportion to the wealth and population of the kingdom, than in the United States. But where there is no limitation as to their number, the increase will be inevitable, so long as banking continues to be among the most certain, eligible, and profitable employments of capital, as is now the case. With these inducements, there must be constant application for new banks, whenever there is the least prospect of profitable employment—banks to be founded mainly on nominal and fictitious capital, and adding but little to that already in existence—and with our just and natural aversion to monopoly, it is difficult, on principles of equality and justice, to resist such application. The admission of a new bank tends to diminish the profits of the old, and between the aversion of the old to reduce their income and the desire of the new to acquire profits, the result is, an enlargement of discounts, effected by a mutual spirit of forbearance; an indisposition on the part of each to oppress the other; and, finally, the creation of a community of feeling, to stigmatize and oppose those, whether banks or individuals, who demand specie in payment of their notes. This community of feeling, which ultimately identifies the whole, as a peculiar and distinct interest in the community, increases and becomes more and more intense, just in proportion as banks multiply; as they become, if I may use the expression, too populous, and, from the pressure of increasing numbers, in maintaining their existence, there results a corresponding increase of issues, in proportion to their means; which explains the present extraordinary disproportion between specie and notes, in those States where banks have been most multiplied; equal in some to sixteen to one. There results, from this state of things, some political considerations which demand the profound attention of all who value the liberty and peace of the country.

While the banking system rests on a solid foundation, there will be, on their part, but little dependance on the Government, and but little means by which the Government can influence them, and as little disposition on the part of the banks to be connected with it; but in the progress of the system, when their number is greatly multiplied, and their issues, in proportion to their means, are correspondingly increased, the condition of the banks becomes more and more critical. Every adverse event in the commercial world, or political movement that disturbs the present state of things, agitates and endangers them. They become timid, and anxious for their safety, and necessarily court those in power, in order to secure their protection. Property is, in its nature, timid, and seeks protection, and nothing is more grateful to Government than to become a protector. A union is the result; and when that union takes place—when the Government, in fact, becomes the bank direction, regulating its favors and accommodation, the downfall of liberty is at hand. Are there not indications that we are not far removed from this state of things? Do we not behold in those events which have so deeply agitated us within the last few months, and which have interrupted all the business transactions of this community, a strong tendency to this union on the part of one department of this Government, and a portion of the banking system? Has not this union been, in fact, consummated, in the largest and most commercial of the States? What is the safety-fund system of New York but a union between the banks and the State, and a consummation, by law, of that community of feeling in the banking system, which I have attempted to illustrate; the object of which is to extend their discounts; and to obtain which, the interior banks of that State have actually put themselves under the immediate protection of the Government? The effects have been striking. Already have they become substantially mere paper machines, several having not more than from one to two cents in specie to the dollar, when compared with their circulation; and, taking the aggregate, their average condition will be found to be but little better. I care not (said Mr. C.) whether the present commissioners are partisans of the present State administration or not; or whether the assertion of the Senator from New York, [Mr. WADSWORTH,] that the Government of the State has not interfered in the control of these institutions, be correct. Whether it has taken place or not, interference is inevitable. In such a state of weakness, a feeling of dependence is unavoidable, and the control of the Government over the action of the banks, whenever that control shall become necessary to subserve the ambition or the avarice of those in power, is certain.

Such is the strong tendency of our banks to terminate their career in the paper system—in an open suspension of specie payment. Whenever that event occurs, the progress to convulsion and revolution will be rapid. The currency will become local, and each State will have a powerful interest to depreciate its currency more rapidly than its neighbor, as the means, at the same time, of exempting itself from the taxes of the Government and drawing the commerce of the country to its ports. This was strongly exemplified after the suspension of specie payments during the late war, when the depreciation made the most rapid progress, till checked by the establishment of the present Bank of the United States, and when the foreign trade of the country was as rapidly converging to the point of the greatest depreciation, with a view of exemption from duties, by paying in the debased currency of the place.

What, then, is the disease which afflicts the system; what the remedy; and what the means of applying it? These are the questions which I shall next proceed to consider. What I have already stated points out the disease. It consists in a great and growing disproportion between the metallic and paper circulation of the country, effected through the instrumentality of the banks, a disproportion daily and hourly increasing, under the impulse of most powerful causes, which are rapidly accelerating the country to that state of convulsion and revolution which I have indicated. The remedy is to arrest its future progress, and to diminish the existing disproportion—to increase the metals, and to diminish the paper—advancing till the country shall be restored to a sound, safe, and settled condition. On these two points all must be agreed. There is no man of any party, capable of reflecting, and who will take the pains to inform himself, but must agree that our currency is in a dangerous condition, and that the danger is increasing; nor is there any one who can doubt that the only safe and effectual remedy is to diminish the disproportion to which I have referred. Here the extremes unite; the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] who is the open and avowed advocate of a pure metallic currency, and the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WADSWORTH,] who stands here as the able and strenuous advocate of the banking system, are on this point united, and must move from it in the same direction, though it may be the design of the one to go through, and of the other to halt after a moderate advance.

There is another point in which all must be agreed—that the remedy must be gradual; the change from the present to another and sounder condition, slow and cautious. The necessity for this, results from that highly delicate nature of currency which I have already illustrated. Any sudden and great change from our present to even a sounder condition, would agitate and convulse society to the centre. On another point, there can be but little disagreement: Whatever may be the different theoretical opinions of the members of the Senate, as to the extent to which the reformation of the currency should be carried, even those who think it may be carried practically and safely to the restoration of a metallic currency, to the entire exclusion of paper, must agree that the restoration ought not to be carried farther than a cautious and a slow experience shall prove that it can be done consistently with the prosperity of the country, in the existing fiscal and commercial condition of the world. To go beyond the point to which experience shall show it is proper to go, would be to sacrifice the public interest merely to a favorite conception. There may be ultimately a disagreement of opinion where that point is; but since all must be agreed to move forward in the same direction, and at the same pace, let us set out in the spirit of harmony and peace, though we intend to stop at different points. It may be that, enlightened by experience, those who intend to stop at the nearest point, may be disposed to advance farther, and that those who intend to go farthest, may halt on this side, so that finally all may agree to terminate the journey together. This brings us to the question of how shall so salutary a change be effected; what the means and the mode of application? A great and difficult question, on which some diversity of opinion may be expected.

No one can be more sensible than I am of the responsibility that must be incurred in proposing measures on questions of so much magnitude, and which, in so distracted a state of the public mind, must affect, seriously, great and influential interests. But this is no time to shun responsibility. The danger is great and menacing, and delay hazardous, if not ruinous. While, however, I would not shun, I have not sought, the responsibility. I have waited for others, and had any one proposed an adequate remedy, I would have remained silent. And here, said Mr. C., let me express the deep regret which I feel, that the administration, with all that weight of authority which belongs to its power and immense patronage, had not, instead of the deposite question, which has caused such agitation and distress, taken up the great subject of the currency, examined it gravely and deliberately in all its bearings, pointed out its diseased condition, designated the remedy, and proposed some safe, gradual, and effectual means of applying it. Had that course been pursued, my zealous and hearty co operation would not have been wanting. Permit me, also, to express a similar regret, that, the administration having failed in this great point of duty, the opposition, with all its weight and talents, headed on this question by the distinguished and able Senator from Massachusetts, who is so capable of comprehending this subject in all its bearings, had not brought forward, under its auspices, some permanent system of measures, based upon a deliberate and mature investigation into the cause of the existing disease, and calculated to remedy the disordered state of the currency. What might have been brought forward by them with such fair prospects of success, has been thrown on more incompetent hands, unaided by patronage or influence, saving only that influence which truth, clearly developed, and honestly and zealously advanced, may be supposed to possess, and on which I must wholly rely.

But to return to the subject. Whatever diversity of sentiment there may be as to the means, on one point all must be agreed: nothing effectual can be done; no check interposed to restore or arrest the progress of the system by the action of the States. The reasons already assigned, to prove that banking by one State compels all others to bank, and that the excess of banking in one, in like manner compels all others to like excess, equally demonstrate that it is impossible for the States, acting separately, to interpose any means to prevent the catastrophe which certainly awaits the system, and perhaps the Government itself, unless the great and growing danger to which I refer be timely and effectually arrested. There is no power any where, but in this Government—the joint agent of all the States, and through which the concert of the action of the whole can be effected—adequate to this great task. The responsibility is upon us, and upon us alone. The means, if means there be, must be applied by our hands, or not applied at all—a consideration, in so great an emergency, and in the presence of such imminent danger, calculated, I would suppose, to dispose all to co-operation, and to allay every party feeling in the heart even of the least patriotic.

What means do we possess, and how can they be applied? If the entire banking system was under the immediate control of the General Government, there would be no difficulty in devising a safe and effectual remedy to restore the equilibrium so desirable between the specie and the paper which compose our currency. But the fact is otherwise. With the exception of the Bank of the United States, all the other banks owe their origin to the authority of the several States, and are under their immediate control, which presents the great difficulty experienced in devising the proper means of effecting the remedy which all feel to be so desirable.

Among the means which have been suggested, a Senator from Virginia, not now a member of this body, [Mr. RIVES,] proposed to apply the taxing power to suppress the circulation of small notes, with a view of diminishing the paper and increasing the specie circulation. The remedy would be simple and effective, but is liable to great objection. The taxing power is odious under any circumstances; it would be doubly so when called into exercise with an overflowing Treasury; and still more so, with the necessity of organizing an expensive body of officers to collect a single tax, and that on an inconsiderable subject. But there is another, and of itself a decisive objection. It would be unconstitutional—palpably and dangerously so. All political powers, as I stated on another occasion, are trust powers, and limited in their exercise to the subject and object of the grant. The tax power was granted to raise revenue, for the sole purpose of supplying the necessary means of carrying on the operations of the Government. To pervert this power from the object thus intended by the constitution, to that of repressing the circulation of bank notes, would be to convert it from a revenue into a penal power—a power in its nature and object essentially different from that intended to be granted in the constitution; and a power which, in its full extension, if once admitted, would be sufficient of itself to give an entire control to this Government over the property and the pursuits of the community, and thus concentrate and consolidate the entire power of the system in this Government.

Rejecting, then, the taxing power, there remains two obvious and direct means in possession of the Government, which may be brought into action to effect the object intended, but neither of which, either separately or jointly, are of sufficient efficacy, however indispensable they may be as a part of an efficient system of measures, to correct the present or repress the growing disorders of the currency; I mean that provision in the constitution which empowers Congress to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin, and the power of prohibiting any thing but the legal currency to be received, either in whole or in part, in the dues of the Government. The mere power of coining and regulating the value of coins, of itself, and unstained by any other measure, can exercise but a limited control over the actual currency of the country, and is inadequate to check excess or correct disorder, as is demonstrated by the present diseased state of the currency. Congress has had, from the beginning, laws upon the statute books to regulate the value of the coins; and, at an early period of the Government, the mint was erected, and has been in active operation ever since; and yet, of the immense amount which has been coined, a small residue only remains in the country; the great body having been expelled under the operation of the banking system. To give efficacy to this power, then, some other must be combined with it. The most immediate and obvious, is that which has been suggested, of excluding all but specie in the receipts of the Government. This measure would be effectual to a certain extent; but with a declining income, which must take place under the operation of the act of the last session to adjust the tariff, and which must greatly reduce the revenue, (a point of the utmost importance to the reformation and regeneration of our institutions,) the efficacy of the measure must be correspondingly diminished. From the nature of things, it cannot greatly exceed the average of the Government deposits, which I hope will, before many years, be reduced to the smallest possible amount, so as to prevent the possibility of the recurrence of the shameful and dangerous state of things which now exists, and which has been caused by the vast amount of the surplus revenue. But there is, in my opinion, a strong, if not an insuperable objection against resorting to this measure, resulting from the fact that an exclusive receipt of specie in the Treasury, would, to give it efficacy, and to prevent extensive speculation and fraud, require an entire disconnection, on the part of the Government, with the banking system, in all its forms, and a resort to the strong box, as the means of preserving and guarding its funds—a means, if practicable at all in the present state of things, liable to the objection of being far less safe, economical, and efficient, than the present.

What, then, Mr. C. inquired, what other means do we possess, of sufficient efficacy, in combination with those to which I have referred, to arrest the farther progress and correct the disordered state of the currency? This is the deeply important question, and here some division of opinion must be expected, however united we may be, as I trust we are thus far, on all other points. I intend to meet this question explicitly and directly, without reservation or concealment.

After a full survey of the whole subject, I see none—I can conjecture no means of extricating the country from its present danger, and to arrest its farther increase, but a bank—the agency of which, in some form, or under some authority, is indispensable. The country has been brought into the present diseased state of the currency by banks, and must be extricated by their agency. We must, in a word, use a bank to unbank the banks, to the extent that may be necessary to restore a safe and stable currency—just as we apply snow to a frozen limb, in order to restore vitality and circulation, or hold up a burn to the flame to extract the inflammation. All must see that it is impossible to suppress the banking system at once. It must continue for a time. Its greatest enemies, and the advocates of an exclusive specie circulation, must make it a part of their system to tolerate the banks for a longer or a shorter period. To suppress them at once, would, if it were possible, work a greater revolution, a greater change in the relative condition of the various classes of the community, than would the conquest of the country by a savage enemy. What, then, must be done? I answer, a new and safe system must gradually grow up under, and replace, the old; imitating, in this respect, the beautiful process which we sometimes see, of a wounded or diseased part in a living organic body, gradually superseded by the healing process of nature.

Re-chartering Bank United States.

How is this to be effected? How is a bank to be used as the means of correcting the excess of the banking system? And what bank is to be selected as the agent to effect this salutary change? I know, said Mr. C., that a diversity of opinion will be found to exist, as to the agent to be selected, among those who agree on every other point, and who, in particular, agree on the necessity of using some bank as the means of effecting the object intended; one preferring a simple re-charter of the existing bank—another, the charter of a new bank of the United States—a third, a new bank ingrafted upon the old—and a fourth, the use of the State banks, as the agent. I wish, said Mr. C., to leave all these as open questions, to be carefully surveyed and compared with each other, calmly and dispassionately, without prejudice or party feeling; and that to be selected which, on the whole, shall appear to be best—the most safe; the most efficient; the most prompt in application, and the least liable to constitutional objection. It would, however, be wanting in candor on my part, not to declare that my impression is, that a new bank of the United States, ingrafted upon the old, will be found, under all the circumstances of the case, to combine the greatest advantages, and to be liable to the fewest objections; but this impression is not so firmly fixed as to be inconsistent with a calm review of the whole ground, or to prevent my yielding to the conviction of reason, should the result of such review prove that any other is preferable. Among its peculiar recommendations, may be ranked the consideration, that while it would afford the means of a prompt and effectual application for mitigating and finally removing the existing distress, it would, at the same time, open to the whole community a fair opportunity of participation in the advantages of the institution, be they what they may.

Let us then suppose (in order to illustrate and not to indicate a preference) that the present bank be selected as the agent to effect the intended object. What provisions will be necessary? I will suggest those that have occurred to me, mainly, however, with a view of exciting the reflection of those much more familiar with banking operations than myself, and who, of course, are more competent to form a correct judgment on their practical effect.

Let, then, the bank charter be renewed for twelve years after the expiration of the present term, with such modifications and limitations as may be judged proper, and that, after that period, it shall issue no notes under ten dollars; that Government shall not receive in its dues any sum less than ten dollars, except in the legal coins of the United States; that it shall not receive in its dues the notes of any bank that issues notes of a denomination less than five dollars; and that the United States Bank shall not receive in payment, or on deposit, the notes of any bank whose notes are not receivable in dues of the Government; nor the notes of any bank which may receive the notes of any bank whose notes are not receivable by the Government. At the expiration of six years from the commencement of the renewed charter, let the bank be prohibited from issuing any note under twenty dollars, and let no sum under that amount be received in the dues of the Government, except in specie; and let the value of gold be raised at least equal to that of silver, to take effect immediately, so that the country may be replenished with the coin, the lightest and the most portable in proportion to its value, to take the place of the receding bank notes. It is unnecessary for me to state, that at present, the standard value of gold is several per cent. less than that of silver, the necessary effect of which has been to expel gold entirely from our circulation, and thus to deprive us of a coin so well calculated for the circulation of a country so great in extent, and having so vast an intercourse, commercial, social, and political, between all its parts, as ours. As an additional recommendation to raise its relative value, gold has, of late, become an important product of three considerable States of the Union, Virginia, North Carolina, and Georgia—to the industry of which, the measure proposed would give a strong impulse, and which in turn would greatly increase the quantity produced.

Such are the means which have occurred to me. There are members of this body far more competent to judge of their practical operation than myself, and as my object is simply to suggest them for their reflection, and for that of others who are more familiar with this part of the subject, I will not at present enter into an inquiry as to their efficiency, with a view of determining whether they are fully adequate to effect the object in view or not. There are doubtless others of a similar description, and perhaps more efficacious, that may occur to the experienced, which I would freely embrace, as my object is to adopt the best and most efficient. And it may be hoped that, if on experience it should be found that neither these provisions nor any other in the power of Congress, are fully adequate to effect the important reform which I have proposed, the co-operation of the States may be afforded, at least to the extent of suppressing the circulation of notes under five dollars, where such are permitted to be issued under their authority.

I omitted in the proper place to state my reason for suggesting twelve years as the term for the renewal of the charter of the bank. It appears to me that it is long enough to permit the agitation and distraction which now disturbs the country to subside, while it is sufficiently short to enable us to avail ourselves of the full benefit of the light of experience which may be expected to be derived from the operation of the system under its new provisions. But there is another reason which appears to me to be entitled to great weight. The charter of the Bank of England has recently been renewed for the term of ten years, with very important changes, calculated to furnish much experience upon the nature of banking operations and currency. It is highly desirable, if the bank charter should be renewed, or a new bank created, that we should have the full benefit of that experience before the expiration of the term, which would be effected by fixing the period for the time I have designated. But as my object in selecting the re-charter of the Bank of the United States, was simply to enable me to present the suggestions I have made, in the clearest form, and not to advocate the re-charter, I shall omit to indicate many limitations and provisions, which seem to me to be important to be considered, when the question of its permanent renewal is presented, should it ever be. Among others, I entirely concur in the suggestion of the Senator from Georgia, of fixing the rate of interest at five per cent.; a suggestion of the very highest importance, as having a most important bearing on the value of property and the prosperity of the country, in every branch of its industry, and to which but one objection can, in my opinion, be presented: I mean the opposing interest of existing State institutions, all of which, discounting at higher rates, may defeat any measure of which it constitutes a part. In addition, I will simply say, that I, for one, shall feel disposed to adopt such provisions as are best calculated to secure the Government from any supposed influence on the part of the bank, or the bank from an improper interference on the part of the Government, or which may be necessary to protect the rights or interests of the States.

Re-chartering Bank United States.

[SENATE.]

Having now stated the measure necessary to apply the remedy, I am thus brought to the question, Can the measure succeed? which brings up the inquiry of how far it may be expected to receive the support of the several parties which compose the Senate, and on which I shall next proceed to make a few remarks.

First, then, Can the State rights party give it their support?—that party, of which I am proud of being a member, and for which I entertain so strong an attachment—the stronger because we are few among many. In proposing this question, I am not ignorant of their long-standing constitutional objection to the bank, on the ground that this was intended to be, as it is usually expressed, a hard money Government—a Government, whose circulating medium was intended to consist of the precious metals, and for which object the power of coining money, and regulating the value thereof, was expressly conferred by the constitution. I know how long, and how sincerely this opinion has been entertained, and under how many difficulties it has been maintained. It is not my intention to attempt to change an opinion so firmly fixed—but I may be permitted to make a few observations, in order to present what appears to me to be the true question in reference to this constitutional point, in order that we may fully comprehend the circumstances under which we are placed in reference to it. With this view, I do not deem it necessary to inquire whether, in conferring the power to coin money, and to regulate the value thereof, the constitution intended to limit the power strictly to coining money and regulating its value, or whether it intended to confer a more general power over the currency; nor do I intend to inquire whether the word coin is limited simply to the metals, or may be extended to other substances, if through a gradual change they may become the medium of the general circulation of the world. I pass these points. Whatever opinion there may be entertained in reference to them, we all must agree, as a fixed principle in our system of thinking on constitutional questions, that the power under consideration, like other political powers, is a trust power, and that, like all such powers, it must be so exercised as to effect the object of the trust, as far as it may be practicable. Nor can we disagree, that the object of the power was to secure to these States a safe, uniform, and stable currency. The nature of the power, the terms used to convey it, the history of the times, the necessity, with the creation of a common Government, of having a common and uniform circulating medium, and the power conferred to punish those who, by counterfeiting, may attempt to debase and degrade the coins of the country, all proclaim this to be the object.

It is not my purpose to inquire whether, admitting this to be the object, Congress is not bound to use all the means in its power to give this safety, this stability, this uniformity to the currency, for which the power was conferred—nor to inquire whether the States are not bound to abstain from acts on their part, inconsistent with these objects; nor to inquire whether the right of banking, on the part of a State, does not directly, and by immediate consequence, injuriously affect the currency; whether the effect of banking is not to expel the specie currency which, according to the assumption that this is a hard money Government, it was the object of the constitution to furnish, in conferring the power to coin money; or whether the effect of banking does not necessarily tend to diminish the value of a specie currency, as certainly as clipping or reducing its weight would; and whether it has not, in fact, since its introduction, reduced the value of the coins one-half. Nor do I intend to inquire whether Congress is not bound to abstain from all acts on its part calculated to affect injuriously the specie circulation, and whether the receiving of any thing but specie, in its dues, must not necessarily so affect it, by diminishing the quantity in circulation and depreciating the value of what remains. All these questions I leave open; I decide none of them. There is one, however, that I will decide. If Congress has a right to receive any thing else than specie in its dues, they have the right to regulate its value; and have a right, of course, to adopt all necessary and proper means, in the language of the constitution, to effect the object. It matters not what they receive, tobacco or any thing else, this right must attach to it. I do not affirm the right of receiving, but I do hold it to be incontrovertible, that, if Congress were to order the dues of the Government to be paid, for instance, in tobacco, they would have the right, they would be bound to use all necessary and proper means to give it a uniform and stable value; inspections, appraisement, designation of qualities, and whatever else would be necessary to that object. So, on the same principle, if they receive bank notes, they are equally bound to use all means necessary and proper, according to the peculiar nature of the subject, to give them uniformity, stability, and safety. The very receipt of bank notes on the part of the Government, in its dues, would, it is conceded, make them money, and by a necessary consequence, would make them, to a great extent, the currency of the country. I say nothing of the positive provision in the constitution which declares that "all duties, imposts, and excises, shall be uniform throughout the United States," which cannot be, unless that in which they are paid, should also have, as nearly as practicable, a uniform value throughout the country. To effect this, where bank notes are received, the banking power is necessary and proper within the meaning of the constitution; and consequently, if the Government has the right to receive bank notes in its dues, the power becomes constitutional. Here lies, said Mr. C., the real constitutional question: Has the Government a right to receive bank notes or not? The question is not upon the mere power of incorporating a bank, as it has been commonly argued; though even in that view, there would be as great a constitutional objection to any act on the part of the Executive, or any other branch of the Government, which should unite any association of State banks into one system, as the means of giving the uniformity and stability to the currency which the constitution intends to confer. The very act of so associating or incorporating them into one, by whatever name called, or by whatever department performed, would be in fact an act of incorporation.

But, said Mr. C., my object, as I have stated, is not to discuss the constitutional questions, nor to determine whether the bank be constitutional or not. It is, I repeat, to show where the difficulty lies—a difficulty which I have felt from the time I first came into the public service. I found then, as now, the currency of the country consisting almost entirely of bank notes. I found the Government intimately connected with the system, receiving bank notes in its dues and paying them away under its appropriations as cash. The fact was beyond my control; it existed long before my time, and without my agency; and I was compelled to act on the fact as it existed, without deciding on the many questions which I have suggested, as connected with this subject, and on many of which, I have never yet formed a definite opinion. No one can pay less regard to precedent than I do, acting here in my representative and deliberative character, on legal or constitutional questions; but I have felt from the beginning the full force of the distinction so sensibly taken by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. LETCHER,] between doing and undoing an act, and which he so strongly illustrated in the case of the purchase of Louisiana. The constitutionality of that act was doubted by many at the time, and among others by its author himself: yet he would be considered a madman who, coming into political life, at this late period, would now seriously take up the question of the constitutionality of the purchase, and, coming to the conclusion that it was unconstitutional, should propose to rescind the act and reject from the Union two flourishing States and a growing Territory. Nor would it be an act of much less madness thus to treat the question of the currency, and undertake to suppress the system of bank circulation, which has been growing up from the beginning of the Government, which has penetrated into and connected itself with every branch of business and every department of the Government, on the ground that the constitution intended a specie circulation; or who would treat the constitutional question as one to be taken up de novo, and decided upon elementary principles, without reference to the imperious state of facts.

But, in raising the question whether my friends of the State rights party can consistently vote for the measure which I have suggested, I rest not on the ground that their constitutional opinion, in reference to the bank, is erroneous. I assume their opinion to be correct—I place the argument, not on the constitutionality or unconstitutionality, but on wholly different ground. I lay it down as an incontrovertible principle, that admitting an act to be unconstitutional, but of such a nature that it cannot be reversed at once, or at least without involving such gross injustice to individuals and distress to the community, that it cannot be justified, we may, under such circumstances, vote for its temporary continuance—for undoing gradually, as the only practicable mode of terminating it, consistently with the strictest constitutional objection. The act of the last session adjusting the tariff, furnishes an apt illustration. All of us believed that measure to be unconstitutional and oppressive, yet we voted for the act without supposing we violated the constitution in so doing; although it allowed upward of eight years for the termination of the system, on the ground that to reverse it at once, would spread desolation and ruin over a large portion of the country. I ask that the principle in that case be applied to this. It is equally as impossible to terminate, suddenly, the present system of paper currency, without spreading a desolation still wider and deeper over the face of the country. If it can be reversed at all—if we can ever return to a metallic currency—it must be by gradually undoing what we have done, and to tolerate the system while the process is going on. Thus, the measure which I have suggested proposes for the period of twelve years, to be followed up by a similar process, as far as a slow and cautious experience shall prove we may go, consistently with the public interest, even to its entire reversal, if experience shall prove we may go so far, which, however, I must say, I, for one, do not anticipate; but the effort, if it should be honestly commenced and pursued, would present a case every way parallel to the instance of the tariff to which I have already referred. I go farther, and ask the question, Can you, consistently with your obligation to the constitution, refuse to vote for a measure, if intended in good faith, to effect the object already stated? Would not a refusal to vote for the only means of terminating it consistently with justice, and without involving the horror of revolution, amount in fact and in all its practical consequences, to a vote to perpetuate a state of things, which all must acknowledge to be eminently unconstitutional and highly dangerous to the liberty of the country?

But I know that it will be objected, that the constitution ought to be amended and the power conferred in express terms. I feel the full force of the objection. I hold the position to be sound, that when a constitutional question has been agitated, involving the powers of the Government, which experience shall prove cannot be settled by reason, as is the case of the bank question, those who claim the power ought to abandon it, or obtain an express grant by an amendment of the constitution; and yet, even with this impression, I would at the present time feel much, if not an insuperable objection, to vote for an amendment, till an effort shall be fairly made, in order to ascertain to what extent the power might be dispensed with, as I have proposed. I hold it a sound principle, that no more power should be conferred upon the General Government than is indispensable; and if experience shall prove that the power of banking is indispensable, as I believe it to be, in the actual condition of the currency of this country and of the world generally, I should even then think that whatever power ought to be given, should be given with such restrictions and limitations as would limit it to the smallest amount necessary, and guard it with the utmost care against abuse. As it is, without farther experience, we are at a loss to determine how little or how much will be required to correct a disease which must, if not corrected, end in convulsions and revolution. I consider the whole subject of banking and credit as undergoing at this time, throughout the civilized world, a progressive change, of which I think I perceive many indications. Among the changes in progression, it appears to me, there is a strong tendency in the banking system to resolve itself into two parts—one becoming a bank of circulation and exchange, for the purpose of regulating and equalizing the circulating medium; and the other assuming more the character of private banking; of which separation there are indications in the tendency of the English system, particularly perceptible in the late modifications of the charter of the Bank of England. In the meantime, it would be wise in us to avail ourselves of the experience of the next few years, before any change be made in the constitution, particularly as the course which, it seems to me, it would be advisable to pursue, would be the same whether the power be expressly conferred or not.

I next address myself to the members of the opposition who principally represent the commercial and agricultural portions of the country, where the banking system has been the farthest extended, and where a larger portion of the property exists in the shape of credit than in any other section; and to whom a sound and stable currency is most necessary and the opposite most dangerous. You have no constitutional objection—to you it is a mere question of expediency. Viewed in this light, can you vote for the proposed measure? A measure designed to arrest the approach of events which I have demonstrated must, if not arrested, create convulsions and revolutions; and to correct a disease which must, if not corrected, subject the currency to continued agitations and fluctuations; and in order to give that permanence, stability, and uniformity, which is so essential to your safety and prosperity. To effect this, may require some diminution on the profits of banking; some temporary sacrifice of interest; but if such should be the fact, it will be compensated in more than a hundred-fold proportion, by increased security and durable prosperity. If the system must advance in the course without a check, and explosion follow, remember that where you stand will be the crater! Should the system quake under your feet, the chasm will open that will engulf your institutions and your prosperity!

Can the friends of the administration vote for this measure? If I understand their views, as expressed by the Senator from Missouri, behind me, [Mr. BAXTON,] the Senator from New York, [Mr. WRIGHT,] and other distinguished members of the party, and the views of the President, as expressed in reported conversations, I see not how they can reject the measure. They profess to be the advocates of a metallic currency. I propose to restore it by the most effectual measures that can be devised; gradually and slowly, and to the extent that experience may show that it can be done consistently with a due regard to the public interest. Farther, no one can desire to go. If the means I propose are not the best and most effectual, let better and more effectual be devised. If the process which I propose be too slow or too fast, let it be accelerated or retarded. Permit me to add to these views, what, it appears to me, those whom I address ought to feel with deep and solemn obligation of duty. They are the advocates and the supporters of the administration. It is now conceded, almost universally, that a rash and precipitate act of the Executive, to speak in the mildest terms, has plunged this country into deep and almost universal distress. You are the supporters of this measure—you personally incur the responsibility by that support. How are the consequences of this act to terminate? Do you see the end? Can things remain as they are, with the currency and the Treasury of the country under the exclusive control of the Executive? And by what scheme, what device, do you propose to extricate the country and the constitution from their present dangers?

I have now said what I intended. I have pointed out, without reserve, what I believe in my conscience to be for the public interest. May what I have said be received as favorably as is the sincerity with which it has been uttered. In conclusion, I have but to add, that, if what I have said, shall in any degree contribute to the adjustment of this question, which I believe cannot be left open without imminent danger, I shall rejoice; but if not, I shall at least have the consolation of having discharged my duty.

When Mr. CALHOUN had concluded—

Mr. BENTON rose and expressed his satisfaction that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] had restored the debate to the elevation that belonged to the Senate; he did not mean to descend from that elevation, not of sentiment, thought, and style, to which he had no pretension; but in the mode of conducting the debate, descending to no personal or partisan object, but keeping solely in view the great interests of the country, and the means of accomplishing those interests. Mr. B. said it was now six years since he had begun to oppose the renewal of the charter of this bank, but he had not, until the present moment, found a suitable occasion for showing the people the kind of currency which they were entitled to possess, and probably would possess, on the dissolution of the Bank of the United States. This was a view of the subject which many wished to see, and which he felt bound to give; and which he should proceed to present, with all the brevity and perspicuity of which he was master.

1. In the first place, he was one of those who believed that the Government of the United States was intended to be a hard money Government; that it was the intention, and the declaration, of the constitution of the United States, that the Federal currency should consist of gold and silver; and that there is no power in Congress to issue, or to authorize any company of individuals to issue, any species of Federal paper currency whatsoever.

Every clause in the constitution, said Mr. B., which bears upon the subject of money—every early statute of Congress which interprets the meaning of these clauses—and every historic recollection which refers to them, go hand in hand, in giving to that instrument the meaning which this proposition ascribes to it. The power granted to Congress to coin money is an authority to stamp metallic money, and is not an authority for emitting slips of paper containing promises to pay money. The authority granted to Congress to regulate the value of coin, is an authority to regulate the value of the metallic money, not of paper. The prohibition upon the States against making any thing but gold and silver a legal tender, is a moral prohibition, founded in virtue and honesty, and is just as binding upon the Federal Government as upon the State Governments; and that without a written prohibition; for the difference in the nature of the two Governments is such, that the States may do all things which they are not forbid to do, and the Federal Government can do nothing which it is not authorized by the constitution to do. The power to punish the crime of counterfeiting is limited to the current coin of the United States, and to the securities of the United States, and cannot be extended to the offence of forging paper money, but by that unjustifiable power of construction which finds an implication upon an implication, and hangs one implied power upon another. The word currency is not in the constitution, nor any word which can be made to cover a circulation of bank notes. Gold and silver is the only thing recognised for money. It is the money, and the only money, of the constitution; and every historic recollection, as well as every phrase in the constitution and every early statute on the subject of money, confirms that idea. People were sick of paper money about the time that this constitution was formed. The Congress of the confederation, in the time of the Revolution, had issued a currency of paper money. It had run the full career of that currency. The wreck of two hundred millions of paper dollars lay upon the land. The framers of that constitution worked in the midst of that wreck. They saw the havoc which paper money had made upon the fortunes of individuals, and the morals of the public. They determined to have no more Federal paper money. They created a hard money Government; they intended the new Government to recognise nothing for money but gold and silver, and every word admitted into the constitution, upon the subject of money, defines and establishes that sacred intention.

Legislative enactment, continued Mr. B., came quickly to the aid of constitutional intention and historic recollection. The fifth statute passed at the first session of the first Congress that ever sat under the present constitution, was full and explicit on this head. It defined the kind of money which the Federal Treasury should receive. The enactments of the statute are remarkable for their brevity and comprehension, as well as for their clear interpretation of the constitution, and deserve to be repeated and remembered. They are: That the fees and duties payable to the Federal Government shall be received in gold and silver coin only; the gold coins of France, Spain, Portugal, and England, and all other gold coins of equal fineness, at 89 cents for every pennyweight; the Mexican dollar at 100 cents; the crown of France at 111 cents; and all other silver coins of equal fineness, at 111 cents per ounce. This statute was passed the 30th day of July, 1789—just one month after Congress had commenced the work of legislation. It shows the sense of the Congress composed of the men, in great part, who had framed the constitution, and who, by using the word only, clearly expressed their intention that gold and silver alone was to constitute the currency of the new Government.

In support of this construction of the constitution, Mr. B. referred to the phrase so often used by our most aged and eminent statesmen, that this was intended to be a hard money Government. Yes, said Mr. B., the framers of the constitution were hard money men; but the chief expounder and executor of that constitution was not a hard money man, but a paper system man! a man devoted to the paper system of England, with all the firmness of conviction, and all the fervor of enthusiasm. God forbid, said Mr. B., that I should do injustice to General Hamilton—that I should say, or insinuate, ought to derogate from the just fame of that great man! He has many titles to the gratitude and admiration of his countrymen, and the heart could not be American which could dishonor or disparage his memory. But his ideas of government did not receive the sanction of general approbation and of all his political tenets, his attachment to the paper system was most strongly opposed at the time, and has produced the most lasting and deplorable results upon the country. In the year 1791, this great man, then Secretary of the Treasury, brought forward his celebrated plan for the support of public credit—that plan which unfolded the entire scheme of the paper system, and immediately developed the great political line between the federalists and the republicans. The establishment of a national bank was the leading and predominant feature of that plan; and the original report of the Secretary, in favor of establishing the bank, contained this fatal and deplorable recommendation:

“The bills and notes of the bank, originally made payable, or which shall have become payable, on demand, in gold and silver coin, shall be receivable in all payments to the United States.”

This fatal recommendation became a clause in the charter of the bank. It was transferred from the report of the Secretary to the pages of the statute book; and from that moment the moneyed character of the Federal Government stood changed and reversed. Federal bank notes took the place of hard money; and the whole edifice of the new Government slid, at once, from the solid rock of gold and silver money, on which its framers had placed it, into the troubled and tempestuous ocean of a paper currency.

Mr. B. said it was no answer to this most serious charge of having changed the moneyed character of the Federal Government, and of the whole Union, to say that the notes of the Bank of the United States are not made a legal tender between man and man. There was no necessity, he said, for a statute law to that effect; it was sufficient that they were made a legal tender to the Federal Government; the law of necessity, far superior to that of the statute book, would do the rest. A law of tender was not necessary; a forced, incidental tender, resulted as an inevitable consequence from the credit and circulation which the Federal Government gave them. Whatever was received at the custom-houses, at the land offices, at the post offices, at the marshals' and district attorneys' offices, and in all the various dues to the Federal Government, must be received and will be received by the people. It becomes the actual and practical currency of the land. People must take it, or get nothing; and thus the Federal Government, establishing a paper currency for itself, establishes it also for the States and for the people, and every body must use it from necessity, whether compelled by law or not.

Mr. B. said it was not to be supposed that the objection which he now took to the unconstitutionality of the clause which made the notes of the Federal bank a legal tender to the Federal Government, was an objection which could be overlooked, or disregarded, by the adversaries of the bank in 1791. It was not overlooked, or disregarded; on the contrary, it was denounced, and combated, as in itself a separate and distinct breach of the constitution, going the whole length of emitting paper money, and the more odious and reprehensible because a privileged company was to have the monopoly of the emission. The genius of Hamilton was put in requisition to answer this objection; and the best answer which that great man could give it, was a confession of the omnipotence of the objection, and the total impossibility of doing it away. His answer surrendered the whole question of a currency. It sunk the notes of the bank, which were then to be tendered to the Federal Government, to the condition of supplies furnished to the Government, and to be consumed by it. The answer took refuge under the natural power, independent of all constitutions, for the tax receiver to receive his taxes in what articles he pleased. To do justice to General Hamilton, and to detect and expose the true character of this bank paper, Mr. B. read a clause from General Hamilton's reply to the cabinet opinions of Mr. Jefferson, and the Attorney General Randolph, when President Washington had the charter of the first bank under advisement with his Secretaries. It was the clause in which General Hamilton replied to the objection to the constitutionality of making the notes of the bank receivable in payment of public dues. “To designate or appoint the money or thing in which taxes are to be paid, is not only a proper, but a necessary exercise of the power of collecting them. Accordingly, Congress, in the law concerning the collection of the duties, imposts, and tonnage, have provided that they shall be payable in gold and silver. But, while it was an indispensable part of the work to say in what they should be paid, the choice of the specific thing was a mere matter of discretion. The payment might have been required in the commodities themselves. Taxes in kind, however ill judged, are not without precedents, even in the United States; or it might have been in the paper money of the several States, or in the bills of the Bank of North America, New York, and Massachusetts, all, or either of them; it might have been in bills issued under the authority of the United States. No part of this, it is presumed, can be disputed. The appointment of the money or thing, in which the taxes are to be paid, is an incident of the power of collection. And among the expedients which may be adopted, is that of bills issued under the authority of the United States.” Mr. B. would read no farther, although the argument of General Hamilton extended through several pages. The nature of the argument is fully disclosed in what is read. It surrenders the whole question of a currency. Neither the power to furnish a currency, or to regulate currency, is pretended to be claimed. The notes of the new bank are put upon the footing, not of money, but of commodities—things—articles in kind—which the tax receiver may accept from the tax payer, and which are to be used and consumed by the tax receiver, and not to be returned to the people, much less to be diffused over the country in place of money. This is the original idea and conception of these notes. It is the idea under which they obtained the legal capacity of receivability in payment of public dues; and from this humble conception, this degraded assimilation to corn and grain, to clothes and provisions, they have, by virtue of that clause in the charter, crept up to the character of money—become the real, practical currency of the land—driven the currency of the constitution from the land—and so depraved the public intellect as now to be called for as money, and proclaimed to be indispensable to the country, when the author of the bank could not rank higher than an expedient for paying a tax.

II. In the next place, Mr. B. believed that the quantity of specie derivable from foreign commerce, added to the quantity of gold derivable from our own mines, were fully sufficient, if not expelled from the country by unwise laws, to furnish the people with an abundant circulation of gold and silver coin, for their common currency, without having recourse to a circulation of small bank notes.

The truth of these propositions, Mr. B. held to be susceptible of complete and ready proof. He spoke first of the domestic supply of native gold, and said that no mines had ever developed more rapidly than these had done, or promised more abundantly than they now do. In the year 1824 they were a spot in the State of North Carolina; they are now a region spreading into six States. In the year 1824 the product was $5,000; in the last year the product, in coined gold, was $868,000; in uncoined, as much more; and the product of the present year computed at two millions, with every prospect of continued and permanent increase. The probability was that these mines alone, in the lapse of a few years, would furnish an abundant supply of gold to establish a plentiful circulation of that metal, if not expelled from the country by unwise laws. But the great source of supply, both for gold and silver, Mr. B. said, was in our foreign commerce. It was this foreign commerce which filled the States with hard money immediately after the close of the revolutionary war, when the domestic mines were unknown; and it is this same foreign commerce which, even now, when Federal laws discourage the importation of foreign coins and compel their exportation, is bringing in an annual supply of seven or eight millions. With an amendment of the laws which now discourage the importation of foreign coins, and compel their exportation, there could be no delay in the rapid accumulation of a sufficient stock of the precious metals to supply the largest circulation which the common business of the country could require.

Mr. B. believed the product of foreign mines, and the quantity of gold and silver now in existence, to be much greater than was commonly supposed; and as a statement of its amount would establish his proposition in favor of an adequate supply of these metals for the common currency of the country, he would state that amount, as he found it calculated in approved works of political economy. He looked to the three great sources of supply: 1. Mexico and South America; 2. Europe and Northern Asia; 3. The coast of Africa. Taking the discovery of the New World as the starting point from which the calculation would commence, and the product was:

|------------------------------|-----------------|
| 1. Mexico and South America, | $6,458,000,000 |
| 2. Europe and Northern Asia, | 628,000,000 |
| 3. The coast of Africa, | 150,000,000 |

—making a total product of seven thousand two hundred and thirty-six millions, in the short space of three centuries and a half. To this is to be added the quantity existing at the time the New World was discovered, and which was computed at $2,300,000,000. Upon all these data the political economists, Mr. B. said, after deducting $2,000,000,000 for waste and consumption, still computed the actual stock of gold and silver in Europe, Asia, and America, in 1832, at about seven thousand millions of dollars, and that quantity constantly and rapidly increasing.

Mr. B. had no doubt but that the quantity of gold and silver in Europe, Asia, and America, was sufficient to carry on the whole business of the world. He said that states and empires—far greater in wealth and population than any now existing—far superior in public and private magnificence—had carried on all the business of private life, and all the affairs of national government, upon gold and silver alone; and that before the mines of Mexico and Peru were known, or dreamed of. He alluded to the great nations of antiquity—to the Assyrian and Persian empires; to Egypt, Carthage, Rome; to the Grecian republics; the kingdoms of Asia Minor; and to the empire, transcending all these put together—the Saracenic empire of the Caliphs, which, taking for its centre the eastern limit of the Roman world, extended its dominion as far west as Rome had conquered, and farther east than Alexander had marched. These great nations, whose armies crushed empires at a blow, whose monumental edifices still attest their grandeur, had no idea of bank credits and paper money. They used gold and silver alone. Such degenerate phrases as sound currency, paper medium, circulating media, never once sounded in their heroic ears. But why go back, exclaimed Mr. B., to the nations of antiquity? Why quit our own day? Why look beyond the boundaries of Europe? We have seen an empire in our own day, of almost fabulous grandeur and magnificence, carrying on all its vast undertakings upon a currency of gold and silver, without deigning to recognise paper for money. I speak, said Mr. B., of France—great and imperial France—and have my eye upon that first year of the consulate, when a young and victorious general, just transferred from the camp to a council, announced to his astonished ministers that specie payments should commence in France by a given day! in that France which, for so many years, had seen nothing but a miserable currency of depreciated mandats and assignats! The annunciation was heard with the inward contempt and open distrust which the whole tribe of hack politicians every where feel for the statesmanship of military men. It was followed by the success which it belongs to genius to inspire and to command. Specie payments commenced in France on the day named; and a hard money currency has been the sole currency of France from that day to this.

Mr. B. here-cited a passage from a letter of Mr. Gallatin to Mr. Ingham, then Secretary of the Treasury, (Dec. 1829,) to confirm what he said of the French currency.

THE PASSAGE.

"For the last twenty-five years the coinage of France has been far greater than that of any other country. I hardly need to observe that this is due to the almost total expulsion of paper as currency. The Bank of France alone issues paper, and none of a denomination less than 500 francs; so that it is used almost exclusively for commercial transactions and remittances, and makes no part of the currency, properly so called, of the country. Paper, as all know, necessarily drives away the precious metals, which will naturally flow to the places where paper is not used. They (the precious metals) are a dearer, but the only safe circulating medium; and no country that will resort to other means, can expect to have a sound and uniform currency."

Such, said Mr. B., is the currency of France; a country whose taxes exceed a thousand millions of francs—whose public and private expenditures require a circulation of three hundred and fifty millions of dollars—and which possesses that circulation, every dollar of it, in gold and silver. After this example, can any one doubt the capacity of the United States to supply itself with specie? Reason and history forbid the doubt. Reason informs us that hard money flows into the vacuum the instant that small bank notes are driven out. France recovered a specie circulation within a year after the consular government refused to recognise paper for money. England recovered a gold circulation of about one hundred millions of dollars within four years after the one and two pound notes were suppressed. Our own country filled up with Spanish milled dollars, French crowns, doubloons, half joes, and guineas, as by magic, at the conclusion of the revolutionary war, and the suppression of the continental bills. The business of the United States would not require above sixty or seventy millions of gold and silver for the common currency of the people, and the basis of large bank notes and bills of exchange. Of that sum more than one-third is now in the country, but not in circulation. The Bank of the United States hoards above ten millions. At the expiration of her charter, in 1836, that sum will be paid out in redemption of its notes—will go into the hands of the people—and, of itself, will nearly double the quantity of silver now in circulation. Our native mines will be yielding, annually, some millions of gold; foreign commerce will be pouring in her accustomed, copious supply; the correction of the erroneous value of gold, the liberal admission of foreign coins, and the suppression of small notes, will invite and retain an adequate metallic currency. The present moment is peculiarly favorable for these measures. Foreign exchanges are now in our favor; silver is coming here, although not current by our laws; both gold and silver would flow in, and that immediately, to an immense amount, if raised to their proper value, and put on a proper footing, by our laws. Three days' legislation on these subjects would turn copious supplies of gold and silver into the country, diffuse them through every neighborhood, and astonish gentlemen when they get home at midsummer, at finding hard money where they had left paper. Mr. B. was against a small paper currency, not against large bank notes, and expressed a concurrence in much that was said on paper money by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] though differing so much on the subject of the national bank.

III. In the third place, Mr. B. undertook to affirm, as a proposition free from dispute or contestation, that the value now set upon gold by the laws of the United States, was unjust and erroneous; that these laws had expelled gold from circulation; and that it was the bounden duty of Congress to restore that coin to circulation, by restoring it to its just value. In this he had the pleasure to concur heartily with the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN.]

That gold was undervalued by the laws of the United States, and expelled from circulation, was a fact, Mr. B. said, which every body knew; but there was something else which every body did not know; which few, in reality, had an opportunity of knowing, but which was necessary to be known, to enable the friends of gold to go to work at the right place to effect the recovery of that precious metal which their fathers once possessed—which the subjects of European kings now possess—which the citizens of the young republics to the South all possess—which even the free negroes of San Domingo possess—but which the yeomanry of this America have been deprived of for more than twenty years, and will be deprived of forever, unless they discover the cause of the evil, and apply the remedy to its root.

I have already shown, said Mr. B., that the plan for the support of public credit which General Hamilton brought forward in 1791, was a plan for the establishment of the paper system in our America. We had at that time a gold currency which was circulating freely and fully all over the country. Gold is the antagonist of paper, and, with fair play, will keep a paper currency within just and proper limits. It will keep down the small notes; for no man will carry a five, a ten, or a twenty dollar note in his pocket, when he can get guineas, eagles, half eagles, doubloons, and half joes, to carry in their place. The notes of the new Bank of the United States, which bank formed the leading feature in the plan for the support of public credit, had already derived one undue advantage over gold in being put on a level with it in point of legal tender to the Federal Government, and universal receivability in all payments to that Government: they were now to derive another, and a still greater undue advantage over gold, in the law for the establishment of the national mint; an institution which also formed a feature of the plan for the support of public credit. It is to that plan that we trace the origin of the erroneous valuation of gold, which has banished that metal from the country. Mr. Secretary Hamilton, in his proposition for the establishment of a mint, recommended that the relative value of gold to silver should be fixed at fifteen for one; and that recommendation became the law of the land, and has remained so ever since. At the same time, the relative value of these metals in Spain and Portugal, and throughout their vast dominions in the new world, whence our principal supplies of gold were derived, was at the rate of sixteen for one; thus making our standard six per cent. below the standard of the countries which chiefly produced gold.

It was also below the English standard, and the French standard, and below the standard which prevailed in these States before the adoption of the constitution, and which was actually prevailing in the States at the time that this new proportion of fifteen to one was established.

Mr. B. was ready to admit that there was some nicety requisite in adjusting the relative value of two different kinds of money—gold and silver for example—so as to preserve an exact equipoise between them, and to prevent either from expelling the other. There was some nicety, but no insuperable or even extraordinary difficulty, in making the adjustment. The nicety of the question was aggravated in the year '92, by the difficulty of obtaining exact knowledge of the relative value of these metals, at that time, in France and England; and Mr. Gallatin has since shown that the information which was then relied upon was clearly erroneous. The consequence of any mistake in fixing our standard, was also well known in the year '92. Mr. Secretary Hamilton, in his proposition for the establishment of a mint, expressly declared that the consequence of a mistake in the relative value of the two metals, would be the expulsion of the one that was undervalued. Mr. Jefferson, then Secretary of State, in his contemporaneous report upon foreign coins, declared the same thing. Mr. Robert Morris, financier to the revolutionary Government, in his proposal to establish a mint, in 1782, was equally explicit to the same effect. The delicacy of the question and the consequence of a mistake, were then fully understood forty years ago, when the relative value of gold and silver was fixed at fifteen to one. But, at that time, it unfortunately happened that the paper system, then omnipotent in England, was making its transit to our America; and every thing that would go to establish that system—every thing that would go to sustain the new-born Bank of the United States—that eldest daughter and spem gregis of the paper system in America—fell in with the prevailing current, and became incorporated in the Federal legislation of the day. Gold, it was well known, was the antagonist of paper: from its intrinsic value, the natural predilection of all mankind for it, its small bulk, and the facility of carrying it about, it would be preferred to paper, either for travelling or keeping in the house; and thus would limit and circumscribe the general circulation of bank notes, and prevent all plea of necessity for issuing smaller notes. Silver, on the contrary, from its inconvenience of transportation, would favor the circulation of bank notes. Hence the birth of the doctrine, that if a mistake was to be committed, it should be on the side of silver! Mr. Secretary Hamilton declares the existence of this feeling when, in his report upon the establishment of a mint, he says: "It is sometimes observed, that silver ought to be encouraged, rather than gold, as being more conducive to the extension of bank circulation, from the greater difficulty and inconvenience which its greater bulk, compared with its value, occasions in the transportation of it." This passage in the Secretary's report, proves the existence of the feeling in favor of silver against gold, and the cause of that feeling. Quotations might be made from the speeches of others to show that they acted upon that feeling; but it is due to Gen. Hamilton to say that he disclaimed such a motive for himself, and expressed a desire to retain both metals in circulation, and even to have a gold dollar.

The proportion of 15 to 1 was established. The 11th section of the act of April, 1792, enacted that every fifteen pounds weight of pure silver, should be equal in value, in all payments, with one pound of pure gold; and so in proportion for less quantities of the respective metals.* This act was the death warrant to the gold currency. The diminished circulation of that coin soon began to be observable, but it was not immediately extinguished. Several circumstances delayed, but could not prevent that catastrophe. 1. The Bank of the United States then issued no note of less denomination than ten dollars, and but few of them. 2. There were but three other banks in the United States, and they issued but few small notes; so that a small note currency did not come directly into conflict with gold. 3. The trade to the lower Mississippi continued to bring up from Natchez and New Orleans, for many years, a large supply of doubloons, and long supplied a gold currency to the new States in the West. Thus, the absence of a small note currency, and the constant arrivals of doubloons from the lower Mississippi, deferred the fate of the gold currency; and it was not until the lapse of near twenty years after the adoption of the erroneous standard of 1792, that the circulation of that metal, both foreign and domestic, became completely and totally extinguished in the United States. The extinction is now complete, and must remain so until the laws are altered.

In making this announcement, and in thus standing forward to expose the error, and to demand the reform of the gold currency, he (Mr. B.) was not setting up for the honors of a first discoverer, or first inventor. Far from it. He was treading in the steps of other, and abler men, who had gone before him. Four Secretaries of the Treasury, Gallatin, Dallas, Crawford, Ingham, had, each in their day, pointed out the error in the gold standard, and recommended its correction. Repeated reports of committees, in both Houses of Congress, had done the same thing. Of these reports he would name those of the late Mr. Lowndes, of South Carolina; of Mr. Sanford, late a Senator from New York; of Mr. Campbell P. White, now a Representative from the city of New York. Mr. B. took pleasure in recalling and presenting to public notice, the names of the eminent men who had gone before him in the exploration of this path. It was due to them, now that the good cause seemed to be in the road to success, to yield to them all the honors of first explorers; it was due to the cause also, in this hour of final trial, to give it the high sanction of their names and labors.

Mr. B. would arrest for an instant the current of his remarks, to fix the attention of the Senate upon a reflection which must suggest itself to the minds of all considerate persons. He would ask how it could happen that so many men, and such men as he had named, laboring for so many years, in a cause so just, for an object so beneficial, upon a state of facts so undeniable, could so long and so uniformly fail of success? How could this happen? Sir, exclaimed Mr. B., it happened because the policy of the Bank of the United States required it to happen! The same policy which required gold to be undervalued in 1792, when the first bank was chartered, has required it to be undervalued ever since, now that a second bank has been established; and the same strength which enabled these banks to keep themselves up, also enabled them to keep gold down. This is the answer to the question, and this the secret of the failure of all these eminent men in their laudable efforts to raise gold again to the dignity of money. This is the secret of their failure, and this secret being now known, the road which leads to the reformation of the gold currency lies uncovered and revealed before us; it is the road which leads to the overthrow of the Bank of the United States—to the sepulchre of that institution; for, while that bank lives, or has the hope of life, gold cannot be restored to life. Here then lies the question of the reform of the gold currency. If the bank is defeated, that currency is reformed; if the bank is victorious, gold remains degraded, to continue an article of merchandise in the hands of the bank, and to be expelled from circulation to make room for its five, its ten, and its twenty dollar notes. Let the people then, who are in favor of restoring gold to circulation, go to work in the right place, and put down the power that first put down gold, and which will never suffer that coin to rise while it has power to prevent it.

Mr. B. did not think it necessary to descant and expatiate upon the merits and advantages of a gold currency. These advantages had been too well known, from the earliest ages of the world, to be a subject of discussion in the nineteenth century; but, as it was the policy of the paper system to disparage that metal, and as that system, in its forty years' reign over the American people, had nearly destroyed a knowledge of that currency, he would briefly enumerate its leading and prominent advantages. 1. It had an intrinsic value, which gave it currency all over the world, to the full amount of that value, without regard to laws or circumstances. 2. It had a uniformity of value, which made it the safest standard of the value of property which the wisdom of man had ever yet discovered. 3. Its portability; which made it easy for the traveller to carry it about with him. 4. Its indestructibility; which made it the safest money that people could keep in their houses. 5. Its inherent purity; which made it the hardest money to be counterfeited, and the easiest to be detected, and, therefore, the safest money for the people to handle. 6. Its superiority over all other money; which gave to its possessor the choice and command of all other money. 7. Its power over exchanges; gold being the currency which contributes most to the equalization of exchange, and keeping down the rate of exchange to the lowest and most uniform point. 8. Its power over the paper money; gold being the natural enemy of that system, and, with fair play, able to hold it in check. 9. It is a constitutional currency; and the people have a right to demand it, for their currency, as long as the present constitution is permitted to exist.

Mr. B. said, that the false valuation put upon gold had rendered the mint of the United States, so far as the gold coinage is concerned, a most ridiculous and absurd institution. It has coined, and that at a large expense to the United States, 2,262,717 pieces of gold, worth $11,852,890; and where are these pieces now? Not one of them to be seen! all sold, and exported! and so regular is this operation that the director of the mint, in his latest report to Congress, says that the new coined gold frequently remains in the mint, uncalled for, though ready for delivery, until the day arrives for a packet to sail to Europe. He calculates that two millions of native gold will be coined annually hereafter; the whole of which, without a reform of the gold standard, will be conducted, like exiles, from the national mint to the sea shore, and transported to foreign regions, to be sold for the benefit of the Bank of the United States.

Mr. B. said this was not the time to discuss the relative value of gold and silver, nor to urge the particular proportion which ought to be established between them. That would be the proper work of a committee. At present it might be sufficient, and not irrelevant, to say that this question was one of commerce—that it was purely and simply a mercantile problem—as much so as an acquisition of any ordinary merchandise from foreign countries could be. Gold goes where it finds its value, and that value is what the laws of great nations give it. In Mexico and South America—the countries which produce gold, and from which the United States must derive their chief supply—the value of gold is 16 to 1 over silver; in the island of Cuba it is 17 to 1; in Spain and Portugal it is 16 to 1; in the West Indies, generally, it is fact from 15.5 to 15.6 : 1. It would be better, at all events, to discontinue altogether the coining of gold than to continue the present system. The average premium on the American gold coins, for the last four and a half years, has been about 5 1-6 on the nominal value." Mr. Gallatin's letter to Mr. Ingham, December 31, 1830.

the same. It is not to be supposed that gold will come from these countries to the United States, if the importer is to lose one dollar in every sixteen that he brings; or that our own gold will remain with us, when an exporter can gain a dollar upon every fifteen that he carries out. Such results would be contrary to the laws of trade; and therefore we must place the same value upon gold that other nations do, if we wish to gain any part of theirs, or to regain any part of our own. Mr. B. said that the case of England and France was no exception to this rule. They rated gold at something less than 16 for 1, and still retained gold in circulation, but it was retained by force of peculiar laws and advantages which do not prevail in the United States. In England the circulation of gold was aided and protected by four subsidiary laws, neither of which exists here: one which prevented silver from being a tender for more than forty shillings; another which required the Bank of England to pay all its notes in gold; a third which suppressed the small note circulation; a fourth which alloyed their silver nine per cent. below the relative value of gold. In France the relative proportion of the two metals was also below what it was in Spain, Portugal, Mexico, and South America, and still a plentiful supply of gold remained in circulation; but this result was aided by two peculiar causes; first, the total absence of a paper currency; secondly, the proximity of Spain, and the inferiority of Spanish manufactures, which gave to France a ready and a near market for the sale of her fine fabrics, which were paid for in the gold of the New World. In the United States gold would have none of these subsidiary helps; on the contrary it would have to contend with a paper currency, and would have to be obtained, the product of our own mines excepted, from Mexico and South America, where it is rated as sixteen to one for silver. All these circumstances, and many others, would have to be taken into consideration in fixing a standard for the United States. Mr. B. repeated that there was nicety, but no difficulty, in adjusting the relative value of gold and silver so as to retain both in circulation. Several nations of antiquity had done it; some modern nations also. The English have both in circulation at this time. The French have both, and have had for thirty years. The States of this Union also had both in the time of the confederation, and retained them until this Federal Government was established, and the paper system adopted. Congress should not admit that it cannot do for the citizens of the United States, what so many monarchies have done for their subjects. Gentlemen, especially, who decry military chieftains, should not confess that they themselves cannot do for America, what a military chieftain did for France. Above all, those who are now engaged in decrying the State Governments, and representing them as unfit to be trusted with their currency without a master, should not come out with a practical confession, that this boasted Federal Government cannot perform for the Union what the State Governments, each for itself, performed for its citizens, for the whole period which elapsed from the close of the Revolution to the establishment of this Government.

Mr. B. made his acknowledgments to the great apostle of American liberty, (Mr. Jefferson,) for the wise, practical idea, that the value of gold was a commercial question, to be settled by its value in other countries. He had seen that remark in the works of that great man, and treasured it up as teaching the plain and ready way to accomplish an apparently difficult object; and he fully concurred with the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] that gold, in the United States, ought to be the preferred metal; not that silver should be expelled, but both retained; the mistake, if any, to be in favor of gold, instead of being against it.

[At this point, Mr. BENTON gave way to a motion to adjourn; which was carried. On the succeeding day

Mr. B. resumed and concluded his remarks, as given below.]

IV. Mr. B. believed that it was the intention and declared meaning of the constitution, that foreign coins should pass currently as money, and at their full value, within the United States; that it was the duty of Congress to promote the circulation of these coins by giving them their full value; that this was the design of the States in conferring upon Congress the exclusive power of regulating the value of these coins; that all the laws of Congress for preventing the circulation of foreign coins, and underrating their value, were so many breaches of the constitution, and so many mischiefs inflicted upon the States; and that it was the bounden duty of Congress to repeal all such laws; and to restore foreign coins to the same free and favored circulation which they possessed when the Federal constitution was adopted.

In support of the first branch of his first position Mr. B. quoted the words of the constitution which authorized Congress to regulate the value of foreign coins; secondly, the clause in the constitution which authorized Congress to provide for punishing the counterfeiting of current coin, in which term, foreign coin was included; thirdly, the clause which prohibited the States from making anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts; a clause which did not limit the prohibition to domestic coins, and therefore included foreign ones. These three clauses, he said, were concurrent, and put foreign coin and domestic coin, upon the same precise footing of equality, in every particular which concerned their current circulation, their value, and their protection from counterfeiters. Historical recollections were the next evidence to which Mr. B. referred to sustain his position. He said that foreign coins were the only coins known to the United States at the adoption of the constitution. No mint had been established up to that time. The coins of other nations furnished the currency, the exclusive metallic currency, which the States had used from the close of the revolutionary war up to the formation of this Federal Government. It was these foreign coins then which the framers of the constitution had in view when they inserted all the clauses in the constitution which bear upon the value and current circulation of coin; its protection from counterfeiters, and the prohibitory restriction upon the States with respect to the illegality of tenders of any thing except of gold and silver. To make this point still plainer, if plainer it could be made, Mr. B. adverted to the early statutes of Congress which related to foreign coins. He had seen no less than nine statutes, passed in the first four years of the action of this Federal Government, all enacted for the purpose of regulating the value, protecting the purity, and promoting the circulation of these coins. Not only the well-known coins of the principal nations were provided for in these statutes, but the coins of all the nations with whom we traded, how rare or small might be the coin, or how remote or inconsiderable might be the nation. By a general provision of the act of 1789, the gold coins of all nations, which equalled those of England, France, Spain, and Portugal, in fineness, were to be current at 89 cents the pennyweight; and the silver coins of all nations, which equalled the Spanish dollar in fineness, were to be current at 111 cents the ounce. Under these general provisions, a great influx of the precious metals took place, doubloons, guineas, half joes, were the common and familiar currency of farmers and laborers, as well as of merchants and traders. Every substantial citizen then kept in his house a pair of small scales to weigh gold, which are now used by his posterity to weigh physic. It is a great many years—a whole generation has grown up—since these scales were used for their original purpose; nor will they ever be needed again for that use until the just and wise laws of '89 and '90, for the general circulation of foreign coins, shall again be put in force.

Re-chartering Bank United States.

[SENATE.]

These early statutes, added to historical recollections, could leave no doubt of the true meaning of the constitution, and that foreign coins were intended to be forever current within the United States.

With this obvious meaning of the constitution, and the undeniable advantage which redounded to the United States from the acquisition of the precious metals from all foreign nations, the inquiry naturally presents itself to know for what reason these coins have been out-lawed by the Congress of the United States, and driven from circulation? The inquiring mind wishes to know how Congress could be brought, in a few short years after the adoption of the constitution, to contradict that instrument in a vital particular—to repeal the nine statutes which they had passed in favor of foreign coin—and to legalize the circulation of that coin whose value they were to regulate, and whose purity to protect?

Sir, said Mr. B., I am unwilling to appear always in the same train, tracing up all the evils of our currency to the same fountain of mischiefs, the introduction of the paper system, and the first establishment of a Federal bank among us. But justice must have its way; historical truth must take its course; facts must be told; and authentic proof shall supply the place of narrative and assertion. We ascend, then, to the year '91—to the exhibition of the plan for the support of public credit—and see in that plan, as one of its features, a proposition for the establishment of a national mint, and in that establishment a subsidiary engine for the support of the Federal bank. We have already seen that in the proposition for the establishment of the mint, gold was largely undervalued; and that this undervaluation has driven gold from the country and left a vacuum for the circulation of Federal bank notes: we are now to see that the same mint establishment was to give further aid to the circulation of these notes, by excluding foreign coins, both gold and silver, from circulation, and thus enlarging the vacuum which was to be filled by bank paper. This is what we are now to see, and to see it, we will look at the plan for the support of public credit, and that feature of the plan which proposes the establishment of a national mint.

THE REPORT. Extract.

“The last point to be discussed, respects the currency of foreign coins. The abolition of this, in proper season, is a necessary part of the system contemplated for the national coinage. But, this it will be expedient to defer, till some considerable progress has been made in preparing substitutes for them. A gradation may, therefore, be found most convenient. The foreign coins may be suffered to circulate, precisely upon their present footing, for one year after the mint shall have commenced its operations. The privilege may then be continued for another year, to the gold coins of Portugal, England, and France, and to the silver coins of Spain. And these may be permitted to be current for one year more, at the rates allowed to be given for them at the mint; after the expiration of which, the circulation of all foreign coins to cease. The moneys which will be paid into the Treasury, during the first year, being recoined, before they are issued anew, will afford a partial substitute before any interruption is given to the pre-existing supplies of circulation. The revenues of the succeeding year, and the coins which will be brought to the mint in consequence of the discontinuance of their currency, will materially extend the substitute, in the course of that year; and its extension will be so far increased, during the third year, by the facility of procuring the remaining specie to be recoined, which will arise from the diminution of their current values, as probably to enable the dispensing wholly with the circulation of the foreign coins, after that period. The progress which the currency of bank bills will be likely to have made, during the same time, will also afford a substitute of another kind. It may, nevertheless, be advisable to repose a discretionary authority in the President of the United States, to continue the currency of the Spanish dollar, at a value corresponding with the quantity of fine silver in it, beyond the period above mentioned for the cessation of the circulation of foreign coins.”

Mr. B. would remark, that four points were presented in this extract: 1. The eventual abolition of the currency of foreign coins; 2. The reduction of their value while allowed to circulate; 3. The substitution of domestic coins; and 4. The substitution of bank notes in place of the uncurren and undervalued foreign coins. Such were the recommendations of Secretary Hamilton; and legislative enactments quickly followed to convert his recommendations into law. The only power the constitution had given to Congress over foreign coins, was a power to regulate their value and to protect them from debasement by counterfeiters. It was certainly a most strange construction of that authority, first, to underrate the value of these coins, and next, to prohibit their circulation! Yet both things were done. The mint went into operation in 1794; foreign coins were to cease to be a legal tender in 1797: but, at the end of that time, the contingencies on which the Secretary calculated, to enable the country to do without foreign coins, had not occurred; the substitutes had not appeared; the mint had not supplied the adequate quantity of domestic coin, nor had the circulation of bank notes become sufficiently familiar to the people to supersede gold. The law for the exclusion of foreign coins was found to be impracticable, and a suspension of it for three years was enacted. At the end of this time the evil was found to be as great as ever; and a further suspension of three years was made. This third term of three years also rolled over, the supply of domestic coins was still found to be inadequate, and the people continued to be as averse as ever to the bank note substitute. A fourth suspension of the law became necessary, and in 1806 a further suspension for three years was made; after that a fifth, and finally a sixth suspension, each for the period of three years; which brought the period for the actual and final cessation of the circulation of foreign coins, to the month of November, 1819. From that time there was no further suspension of the prohibitory act. An exception was continued, and still remains, in favor of Spanish milled dollars and parts of dollars; but all other foreign coins, even those of Mexico and all the South American States, have ceased to be a legal tender, and have lost their character of current money within the United States. Their value is degraded to the mint price of bullion; and thus the constitutional currency becomes an article of merchandise and exportation. Even the Spanish milled dollar, though continued as a legal tender, is valued, not as money, but for the pure silver in it, and is therefore undervalued three or four per cent. and becomes an article of merchandise. The Bank of the United States has collected and sold 4,450,000 of them. Every money dealer is employed in buying, selling, and exporting them. The South and West, which receives them, is stripped of them. The letter read in the Senate two days ago from the brokers in Georgia, to exculpate themselves from erroneous representations on this floor, contained a striking proof of this fact. It stated that in the sum of $334,000 of silver drawn by them out of the United States Branch Bank in Savannah, there were 27,700 Spanish dollars; that these Spanish dollars were not paid over to the State banks in Georgia, which had contracted for the silver; but remitted to New York, where they commanded a premium of 3 or 4 per cent. Mr. B. did not mention this circumstance as a thing objectionable in those who did it; if they had not drawn them from the branch bank, that branch would have remitted them to the mother bank, and she would have sold them; and the fact of being paid any part of their demand in Spanish dollars, was a proof that their specie was out! His object was to fix public attention upon the fact of the undervaluation of silver, as well as of gold, and the consequent abstraction of that coin from the South and West, and the exportation of it from the country.

Having gone through this narrative of facts, and shown the exclusion of foreign coins from circulation to be a part of the paper system, and intended to facilitate the substitution of a bank note currency, Mr. B. went on to state the injuries resulting from the measure. At the head of these injuries he was bound to place the violation of the constitution of the United States, which clearly intended that foreign coins should circulate among us, and which, in giving Congress authority to regulate their value, and to protect them from counterfeiters, could never have intended to stop their circulation, and to abandon them to debasement. 2. He denounced this exclusion of foreign coins as a fraud, and a fraud of the most injurious nature, upon the people of the States. The States had surrendered their power over the coinage to Congress; they made the surrender in language which clearly implied that their currency of foreign coins was to be continued to them: yet that currency is suppressed; a currency of intrinsic value, for which they paid interest to nobody, is suppressed; and a currency without intrinsic value, a currency of paper subject to every fluctuation, and for the supply of which corporate bodies receive interest, is substituted in its place. 3. He objected to this suppression as depriving the whole Union, and especially the Western States, of their due and necessary supply of hard money. Since that law took effect, the United States had only been a thoroughfare for foreign coins to pass through. All that was brought into the country, had to go out of the country. It was exported as fast as imported. The custom-house books proved this fact. They proved, that from 1821 to 1833, the imports of specie were $89,428,462; the exports, for the same time, were $88,821,433; lacking but three quarters of a million of being precisely equal to the imports! Some of this coin was recoined before it was exported, a foolish and expensive operation on the part of the United States; but the greater part was exported in the same form that it was received. Mr. B. had only been able to get the exports and imports from 1821; if he could have obtained those of 1820, and the concluding part of 1819, when the prohibitory law took effect, the amount would have been about ninety-six millions of dollars; the whole of which was lost to the country by the prohibitory law, while much of it would have been saved, and retained for home circulation, if it had not been for this law. The loss of this great sum in specie was an injury to the whole Union, but especially to the Western States, whose sole resource for coin was from foreign countries; for the coinage of the mint could never flow into that region; there was nothing in the course of trade and exchanges, to carry money from the Atlantic States to the West; and the mint, if it coined thousands of millions, could not supply them. The taking effect of the law in the year 1819, was an aggravation of the injury. It was the most unfortunate and ruinous of all times for driving specie from the country. The Western banks, from their exertions to aid the country during the war, had stretched their issues to the utmost limit; their notes had gone into the land offices; the Federal Government turned them over to the Bank of the United States, and that bank demanded specie. Thus, their necessity for specie was increased at the very moment that the supply was diminished; and the general stoppage of the Western banks, was the inevitable and natural result of these combined circumstances. Mr. B. then read an extract from the memorial of the General Assembly of Louisiana, dated March, 1820, remonstrating against the pernicious consequences of the law for the exclusion of foreign coins, and praying that it might be repealed,

THE MEMORIAL. Extract.

"The General Assembly of the State of Louisiana respectfully represent:

"That the law passed at the late session of Congress, providing that from and after the 1st day of November, 1819, foreign gold coin should cease to be current in the United States, has produced in this State the most pernicious consequences. * * * Those real advantages (importations of gold from Spanish America) have disappeared under the operation of the law above mentioned. Inasmuch as doubloons have ceased to be current in the United States, no reasonable hope can be entertained that traders will persist in bringing them here, when in all the ports of the West Indies they can easily, and at an advantageous rate, exchange them for every kind of commodities and necessary supplies. * * *

Was that law intended to place at the disposal of Government, for coinage, a sufficient quantity of gold? If such was its object, it appears improbable that it will be attained, inasmuch as gold being received at a very high rate at the Havanna, and several other places, it will be purchased here for exportation at a low price by the moneyed men. * * *

It appears that Congress, when they fixed a term after which that money should cease to be current in the United States, had reason to believe that, before the time prescribed, a quantity of American eagles, nearly equal to the amount of the foreign specie withdrawn, would be thrown into circulation; but the General Assembly do not perceive that that object has been fulfilled; and even had it been, they could not have viewed, without regret, the adoption of a measure which tends sensibly to affect the commercial relations between Louisiana and Mexico, and which would flourish as formerly, if a more immediate protection was extended to our navigation in those quarters (against pirates) and the above-mentioned law repealed."

Having shown the great evils resulting to the country from the operation of this law, Mr. B. called upon its friends to tell what reason could now be given for not repealing it? He affirmed that, of the two causes to which the law owed its origin, one had failed in toto, and the other had succeeded to a degree to make it the curse and the nuisance of the country. One reason was to induce an adequate supply of foreign coins to be brought to the mint, to be recoined; the other to facilitate the substitution of a bank note currency. The foreign coins did not go to the mint, those excepted which were imported in its own neighborhood, and even these were exported nearly as fast as recoined. The authority of the director of the mint had already been quoted to show that the new coined gold was transferred direct from the national mint to the packet ships, bound to Europe. The custom-house returns showed the large exportation of domestic coins. They would be found under the head of Domestic Manufactures Exported; and made a large figure in the list of these exports. In the year 1832, it amounted to $2,058,474, and in the year 1833, to $1,410,941; and every year it was more or less: so that the national mint had degenerated into a domestic manufactory of gold and silver, for exportation to foreign countries. But the coins imported at New Orleans, at Charleston, and at other points remote from Philadelphia, did not go there to be recoined. They were, in part, exported direct from the place of import, and in part used by the people as current money, in disregard of the prohibitory law of 1819. But the greater part was exported—for no owner of foreign coin could incur the trouble, risk, and expense, of sending it some hundred or a thousand miles to Philadelphia, to have it recoined, and then incurring the same expense, risk, and trouble, (lying out of the use of the money, and receiving no interest all the while,) of bringing it back to be put into circulation, with the further risk of a deduction for want of standard fineness, at the mint, when he could sell and export it upon the spot. Foreign coins could not be recoined, so as to supply the Union, by a solitary mint on the Atlantic coast. The great West could only be supplied from New Orleans. A branch of the mint, placed there, could supply the West with domestic coins. Mexico, since she became a free country, has established seven mints in different places,* because it was troublesome and expensive to carry bullion from all parts of the country to be coined in the capital; and when coined there, there was nothing in the course of trade to carry them back into the country, and the owners of it would not be at the expense and trouble of carrying it back and getting it into circulation, being the exact state of things at present in the gold mines of the Southern States. The United States, upon the same principles and for the same reasons, should establish branches of the mint in the South, convenient to the gold mine region, and at New Orleans, for the benefit of that city and the West. Without a branch of the mint at New Orleans, the admission of foreign coins is indispensable to the West; and thus the interest of that region joins itself to the voice of the constitution in demanding the immediate repeal of all laws for illegalizing the circulation of these coins, and for sinking them from their current value as money, to their mint value as bullion. The design of supplying the mint with foreign coins, for recoinage, had then failed; and in that respect the exclusion of foreign coins has failed in one of its objects—in the other, that of making room for a substitute of bank notes, the success of the scheme has been complete, excessive, and deplorable.

Mr. B. said, that in demanding the restoration of foreign coins, he was not preferring a new or unheard of demand before the Senate. It was evident from the great number of times that the law for the exclusion of foreign coins had been suspended, so as to postpone its final taking effect from 1793 to 1819, a period of 26 years, that the opposition of the community to it was deep and abiding, and only overcome after a quarter of a century of perseverance on the part of the Federal Government, and in the complete triumph of the paper system in the establishment, for the second time, of a bank of the United States, and making the promissory notes of its corporations a legal tender to the Federal Government, and equal, in law, to the gold and silver of the constitution. The people had struggled for twenty-six years for the preservation of their ancient foreign coins, but were vanquished at last. In the course of this struggle, many reports from committees of Congress, and many memorials from State legislatures, were brought before Congress, to arrest the impending fate of hard money. To read all these reports and memorials would be tedious—to omit all, would be unjust to the subject. He (Mr. B.) had selected two of these papers, both of them peculiarly applicable to the present state of things. One of these papers, the memorial from the General Assembly of Louisiana, he had read; the other, being a report from a committee of the House of Representatives, of which Mr. Quincy, then a member from Massachusetts, was chairman, would now be read, and would derive peculiar interest from being the offspring of similar circumstances to those in which the United States are now placed. The report was made in 1811, in view of the approaching termination of the charter of the first Bank of the United States, and all its reasonings and conclusions are applicable to the present moment.

* By the federal constitution of Mexico, dated October 4, 1824, the federal Congress has the exclusive power to fix the weight, standard, and value of money; but the coinage goes on in Guanajuato, Zacatecas, Guadalajara, Durango, Chihuahua, and Sonora. Before the constitution of 1824, each State fixed the weight, standard, and value, of its own money, and all uniformity of value was destroyed; now that the general Congress fixes it, the value is uniform.

MR. QUINCY'S REPORT. Extract.

"That the general design of the bill (from the Senate) being to increase the current money of the United States, by authorizing foreign gold and silver coins again to become a legal tender, is important in its object, and may be beneficial in its consequences. It is very apparent that the denial to foreign coins, of the privileges of currency, and of being a legal tender, has at once the combined effect of circumscribing the just sphere of mercantile action, and of encouraging the exportation of that species of coin to which these privileges are denied. In the present circumstances of the United States, it seems peculiarly unadvisable to permit any statute prohibitions to continue, which have a tendency to produce such an effect. The statute currency of the United States, which now consists only of the coinage of the United States, and the Spanish milled dollars, and parts of dollars, is also probably insufficient for the ordinary necessities of domestic exchange, and is certainly wholly inadequate to support any peculiar embarrassment of our circulating medium, which, in the event of the dissolution of the Bank of the United States, cannot but be anticipated. Your committee were, therefore, of opinion that foreign coin ought to be made current money, and a legal tender."

The report of the committee (Mr. B. said) was complied with. Foreign coins were again made a legal tender, their value regulated, and their importation encouraged. This continued to be the case until after the present Bank of the United States was chartered; as soon as that event happened, and bank-policy again became predominant in the halls of Congress, the circulation of foreign coins was again struck at; and in the second year of the existence of the bank, the old act of 1793, for rendering these coins uncurrent, was carried into final and complete effect. Since that time the bank has enjoyed all her advantages from this exclusion. The expulsion of these coins has created a vacuum, to be filled up by her small note circulation; the traffic and trade in them, has been as large a source of profit to her as of loss to the country. Gold coin she has sold at an advance of five or six per cent.; silver coin at about two or three per cent.; and, her hand being in, she made no difference between selling domestic coin and foreign coin. Although forbid by her charter to deal in coin, she has employed her branches to gather $40,040,000 of coin from the States, a large part of which she admits that she has sold and transported to Europe. For the sale of the foreign coin, she sets up the lawyer-like plea, that it is not coin, but bullion! resting the validity of the plea upon English statute law! while, by the constitution of the United States, all foreign coins are coin; while by her own charter, the coins, both gold and silver, of Great Britain, France, Spain, Portugal, and their dominions, are declared to be coin, and as such made receivable in payment of the specie proportion of the bank stock—and, worse yet! while Spanish dollars, by statute, remain the current coin of the United States, of which Spanish milled dollars, the bank admits the sale of 4,450,142.

Mr. B. then took a rapid view of the present condition of the statute currency of the United States—of that currency which was a legal tender—that currency which a debtor had a right by law to protect his property from execution, and his body from jail, by offering it, as a matter of right, to his creditor in payment of his debt. He stated this statute currency to be, 1st. Coins from the mint of the United States; 2dly. Spanish milled dollars, and the parts of such dollars. This was the sum total of the statute currency of the United States; for happily no paper of any bank, State or Federal, could be made a legal tender. This is the sum total out of which any man in debt can legally pay his debt; and what is his chance for making payment out of this brief list? Let us

sec. Coinage from the mint: not a particle of gold, nor a single whole dollar to be found; very few half dollars, except in the neighborhood of the mint, and in the hands of the Bank of the United States and its branches; the 20, 10, and 5 cent pieces scarcely seen, except as a curiosity, in the interior parts of the country. So much for the domestic coinage; now for the Spanish milled dollars—how do they stand in the United States? Nearly as scarce as our own dollars; for there has been none coined since Spain lost her dominion over her colonies in the new world; and the coinage of these colonies, now independent States, neither is in law, nor in fact, Spanish milled. That term belongs to the coinage of the Spanish crown, with a Spanish king's head upon the face of it; although the coin of the new States, the silver dollars of Mexico, Central America, Peru, and Chili, are superior to Spanish dollars in value, because they contain more pure silver, still they are not a tender; and all the francs from France, in a word, all foreign coin, except Spanish milled dollars, the coinage of which has ceased, and the country stripped of all that were in it, by the Bank of the United States, are uncurrent, and illegal as tenders: so that the people of the United States are reduced to so small a list, and so small a supply of statute currency, out of which debts can legally be paid, that it may be fairly assumed that the whole debtor part of the community lie at the mercy of their creditors, to have their bodies sent to jail, or their property sold for nothing, at any time that their creditors please. To such a condition are the free and high-minded inhabitants of this country reduced! and reduced by the power and policy of the first and second Banks of the United States, and the controlling influence which they have exercised over the moneyed system of the Union from the year 1791 down to the present day.

Mr. B. would conclude what he had to say on this head with one remark; it was this: that while the gold and silver coin of all the monarchs of Europe were excluded from circulation in the United States, the paper notes of their subjects were received as current money. The Bank of the United States was, in a great degree, a foreign institution. Foreigners held a great part of its stock, and may hold it all. The paper notes issued by this institution, thus composed in great part of the subjects of European kings, are made legal tenders to the Federal Government, and thus forced into circulation among the people; while the gold and silver coin of the kings to which they belong, is rejected and excluded, and expelled from the country! He demanded if any thing could display the vice and deformity of the paper system in a more revolting and humiliating point of view than this single fact?

V. Mr. B. expressed his satisfaction at finding so many points of concurrence between his sentiments on currency, and those of the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN.] Reform of the gold currency—recovery of specie—evils of excessive banking—and the eventual suppression of small notes—were all points in which they agreed, and on which he hoped they should be found acting together when these measures should be put to the test of legislative action. He regretted that he could not concur with that Senator on the great points to which all the others might be found to be subordinate and accessorial. He alluded to the prolonged existence of the Bank of the United States, and especially to the practical views which that Senator had taken of the beneficial operation of that institution, first, as the regulator of the local currencies, and next, as the supplier of a general currency to the Union. On both these points he differed—immeasurably differed, from that Senator; and dropping all other views of that bank, he came at once to the point which the Senator from South Carolina marked out as the true and practical question of debate; and would discuss that question simply under its relation to the currency;

he would view the bank simply as the regulator of local currencies and the supplier of a national currency, and would give his reasons for differing—irreconcilably differing—from the Senator from South Carolina on these points.

Mr. B. took three distinct objections to the Bank of the United States, as a regulator of currency: 1, that this was a power which belonged to the Government of the United States; 2, that it could not be delegated; 3, that it ought not be delegated to any bank.

1. The regulation of the currency of a nation, Mr. B. said, was one of the highest and most delicate acts of sovereign power. It was precisely equivalent to the power to create currency; for a power to make more or less, was, in effect, a power to make much or none. It was the coining power; a power that belonged to the sovereign; and where a paper currency was tolerated, the coining power was swallowed up and superseded by the manufactory which emitted paper. In the present state of the currency of the United States, the Federal bank was the mint for issuing money; the Federal mint was a manufactory for preparing gold and silver for exportation. The States, in the formation of the constitution, gave the coining power to Congress; with that power, they gave authority to regulate the currency of the Union, by regulating the value of gold and silver, and preventing any thing but metallic money from being made a tender in payment of debts. It is by the exercise of these powers that the Federal Government is to regulate the currency of the Union; and all the departments of the Government are required to act their parts in effecting the regulation; the Congress, as the department that passes the law; the President as the authority that recommends it, approves it, and sees that it is faithfully executed; the judiciary, as standing between the debtor and creditor, and preventing the execution from being discharged by any thing but gold and silver, and that at the rate which the legislative department has fixed. This is the power, and sole power, of regulating currency which the Federal constitution contains; this power is vested in the Federal Government, not in one department of it, but in the joint action of the three departments; and while this power is exercised by the Government, the currency of the whole Union will be regulated, and the regulation effected according to the intention of the constitution, by keeping all the local banks up to the point of specie payment, and thereby making the value of their notes equivalent to specie.

2. This great and delicate power, thus involving the sacred relations of debtor and creditor, and the actual rise or fall in the value of every man's property, Mr. B. undertook to affirm, could not be delegated. It was a trust from the State Governments to the Federal Government. The State Governments divested themselves of this power, and invested the Federal Government with it, and made its exercise depend upon the three branches of the new Government; and this new Government could no more delegate it, than they could delegate any other great power which they were bound to execute themselves. Not a word of this regulating power, Mr. B. said, was heard of when the first bank was chartered, in the year 1791. No person whispered such a reason for the establishment of a bank at that time; the whole conception is newfangled—an after-thought—growing out of the very evils which the bank itself has brought upon the country, and which are to be cured by putting down that great bank; after which the Congress and the Judiciary will easily manage the small banks, by holding them up to specie payments, and excluding every unsolid note from revenue payments.

3. Mr. B. said that the Government ought not to delegate this power, if it could. It was too great a power to be trusted to any banking company whatever, or to any authority but the highest and most responsible which was known to our form of Government. The Government itself ceased to be independent—it ceases to be safe—when the national currency is at the will of a company. The Government can undertake no great enterprise, neither of war nor peace, without the consent and co-operation of that company; it cannot count its revenues for six months ahead without referring to the action of that company—its friendship or its enmity—its concurrence or opposition—to see how far that company will permit money to be plenty, or make it scarce; how far it will let the moneyed system go on regularly, or throw it into disorder; how far it will suit the interests, or policy, of that company to create a tempest, or to suffer a calm, in the moneyed ocean. The people are not safe when a company has such a power. The temptation is too great—the opportunity too easy—to put up and put down prices; to make and break fortunes; to bring the whole community upon its knees to the Neptunes who preside over the flux and reflux of paper. All property is at their mercy. The price of real estate—of every growing crop—of every staple article in market—is at their command. Stocks are their play things—their gambling theatre—on which they gamble daily—with as little secrecy, and as little morality, and far more mischief to fortunes, than common gamblers carry on their operations. The philosophic Voltaire, a century ago, from his retreat in Ferney, gave a lively description of this operation, by which he was made a winner, without the trouble of playing. I have a friend, said he, who is a director in the Bank of France, who writes to me when they are going to make money plenty, and make stocks rise, and then I give orders to my broker to sell; and he writes to me when they are going to make money scarce, and make stocks fall, and then I write to my broker to buy; and thus, at a hundred leagues from Paris, and without moving from my chair, I make money. This, said Mr. B., is the operation on stocks to the present day; and it cannot be safe to the holders of stock that there should be a moneyed power great enough in this country to raise and depress the prices of their property at pleasure. The great cities of the Union are not safe, while a company, in any other city, have power over their moneyed system, and are able, by making money scarce or plenty—by exciting panics and alarms—to put up, or put down, the price of the staple articles in which they deal. Every commercial city, for its own safety, should have an independent moneyed system—should be free from the control and regulation of a distant, possibly a rival city, in the means of carrying on its own trade. This, the safety of the Government, the safety of the people, the interests of all owners of property—of all growing crops—the holders of all stocks—the exporters of all staple articles—require that the regulation of the currency should be kept out of the hands of a great banking company, that it should remain where the constitution placed it—in the hands of the Federal Government—in the hands of their representatives who are elected by them, responsible to them, may be exchanged by them, who can pass no law for regulating currency which will not bear upon themselves as well as upon their constituents. This is what the safety of the community requires; and, for one, he (Mr. B.) would not, if he could, delegate the power of regulating the currency of this great country to any banking company whatsoever. It was a power too tremendous to be trusted to a company. The States thought it too great a power to be trusted to the State Governments; he (Mr. B.) thought so too. The States confided it to the Federal Government; he for one, would confine it to the Federal Government, and would make that Government exercise it. Above all, he would not confer it upon a bank which was itself above regulation; and on this point he called upon the Senate to recollect the question, apparently trite, but replete with profound sagacity—that sagacity which it belongs to great men to possess, and to express—which was put to the Congress of 1816, when this bank charter was under discussion, and the regulation of the currency was one of the attributes with which it was to be invested; he alluded to his late esteemed friend, (Mr. Randolph,) and to his call upon the House to tell him who was to bell the cat? That single question contains in its answer, and in its allusion, the exact history of the people of the United States, and of the Bank of the United States, at this day. It was a flash of lightning into the dark vista of futurity, showing in 1816 what we all see in 1834.

Mr. B. took up the second point on which he disagreed with the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] namely, the capacity of the Bank of the United States to supply a general currency to the Union. In handling this question he would drop all other inquiries—lay aside every other objection—overlook every consideration of the constitutionality and expediency of the bank, and confine himself to the strict question of its ability to diffuse and retain in circulation a paper currency over this extended Union. He would come to the question as a banker would come to it at his table, or a merchant in his counting-room, looking to the mere operation of a money system. It was a question for wise men to think of, and for abler men than himself to discuss. It involved the theory and the science of banking—Mr. B. would say, the philosophy of banking, if such a term could be applied to a moneyed system. It was a question to be studied as the philosopher studies the laws which govern the material world—as he would study the laws of gravitation and attraction which govern the movements of the planets, or draw the waters of the mountains to the level of the ocean. The moneyed system, said Mr. B., has its laws of attraction and gravitation—of repulsion and adhesion; and no man may be permitted to indulge the hope of establishing a moneyed system contrary to its own laws. The genius of man has not yet devised a bank—the historic page is yet to be written which tells of a bank—which has diffused over an extensive country, and retained in circulation, a general paper currency. England is too small a theatre for a complete example; but even there the impossibility is confessed, and has been confessed for a century. The Bank of England, in her greatest day of pre-eminence, could not furnish a general currency for England alone—a territory not larger than Virginia. The country banks furnished the local paper currency, and still furnish it, as far as it is used. They carried on their banking upon Bank of England notes, until the gold currency was restored; and local paper formed the mass of local circulation. The notes of the Bank of England flowed to the great commercial capitals, and made but brief sojourn in the counties. But England is not a fair example for the United States; it is too small: a fairer example is to be found nearer home, in our own country, and in this very Bank of the United States which is now existing, and in favor of which the function of supplying a general currency to this extended confederacy is claimed. We have the experiment of this bank, not once, but twice made; and each experiment proves the truth of the laws which govern the system. The theory of bank circulation, over an extended territory, is this, that you may put out as many notes as you may in any one place, they will immediately fall into the track of commerce—into the current of trade—into the course of exchange—and follow that current wherever it leads. In these United States the current sets from every part of the interior, and especially from the South and West into the Northeast—into the four commercial cities north of the Potomac; Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, and Boston; and all the bank notes which will pass for money in those places, fall into the current which sets in that direction. When there, there is nothing in the course of trade to bring them back.

Re chartering Bank United States.

There is no reflux in that current! It is a trade wind which blows twelve months in the year in the same direction. This is the theory of bank circulation over extended territory, and the history of the present bank is an exemplification of the truth of that theory. Listen to Mr. Cheves. Read his report made to the stockholders at their triennial meeting in 1822. He stated this law of circulation, and explained the inevitable tendency of the branch bank notes to flow to the Northeast; the impossibility of preventing it; and the resolution which he had taken and executed, to close all the Southern and Western branches, and prevent them from issuing any more notes. Even while issuing their own notes, they had so far forgot their charter as to carry on operations, in part, upon the notes of the local banks—having collected those notes in great quantity, and loaned them out. This was reported by the investigating committee of 1819, and made one of the charges of misconduct against the bank at that time. To counteract this tendency, the bank applied to Congress for leave to issue their bank notes on terms which would have made them a mere local currency. Congress refused it; but the bank is now attempting to do it herself, by refusing to take the notes received in payment of the Federal revenue, and sending it back to be paid where issued. Such was the history of the branch bank notes, and which caused that currency to disappear from all the interior, and from the whole South and West, so soon after the bank got into operation. The attempt too keep out branch notes, or to send the notes of the mother bank to any distance, being found impracticable, there was no branch currency of any kind in circulation for a period of eight or nine years, until the year 1827, when the branch checks were invented, to perform the miracle which notes could not. Mr. B. would say nothing about the legality of that invention; he would now treat them as a legal issue under the charter; and in that most favorable point of view for them, he would show that these branch checks were nothing but a quack remedy—an empirical contrivance—which made things worse. By their nature they were as strongly attracted to the Northeast as the branch notes had been; by their terms they were still more strongly attracted, for they bore Philadelphia on their face! they were payable at the mother bank! and, of course, would naturally flow to that place for use or payment. This was their destiny, and most punctually did they fulfil it. Never did the trade winds blow more truly—never did the gulf stream flow more regularly—than those checks flowed to the Northeast! The average of four years next ensuing the invention of these checks, which went to the mother bank, or to the Atlantic branches north of the Potomac, including the branch notes which flowed with them, was about nineteen millions of dollars per annum! Mr. B. then exhibited a table to prove what he alleged, and from which it appeared that the flow of the branch paper to the Northeast was as regular and uniform as an operation of nature; that each city, according to its commercial importance, received a greater or less proportion of this inland paper gulf stream; and that the annual variation was so slight as only to prove the regularity of the laws by which it was governed. The following is the table which he exhibited. It was one of the tabular statements obtained by the investigating committee in 1832.

After exhibiting this table, and taking it for complete proof of the truth of the theory which he had laid down, and that it demonstrated the impossibility of keeping up a circulation of the United States Bank paper in the remote and interior parts of the Union, Mr. B. went on to say that the story was yet but half told—the mischief of this systematic flow of national currency to the Northeast was but half disclosed; another curtain was yet to be lifted—another vista was yet to be opened—and the effect of the system upon the metallic currency of the States was to be shown to the people and the States. This view would show, that as fast as the checks or notes of any branch were taken up at the mother bank, or at the branches north of the Potomac, an account was opened against the branch from which they came. The branch was charged with the amount of the notes or checks taken up, and periodically served with a copy of the account, and commanded to send on specie or bills of exchange to redeem them. When redeemed, they were remitted to the branch from which they came; while on the road they were called notes in transitu; and when arrived they were put into circulation again at that place—fell into the current immediately, which carried them back to the Northeast—there taken up again, charged to the branch—the branch required to redeem them again with specie or bills of exchange, and then returned to her, to be again put in circulation, and to undergo again and again, and until the branch could no longer redeem them, the endless process of flowing to the Northeast. The result of the whole was, is, and forever will be, that the branch will have to redeem its circulation till redemption is impossible; until it has exhausted the country of its specie; and then the country in which the branch is situated is worse off than before she had a branch, for she had neither notes nor specie left. Mr. B. said that this was too important a view of the case to be rested on argument and assertion alone; it required evidence to vanquish incredulity, and to prove it up; and that evidence was at hand. He then referred to two tables to show the amount of hard money which the mother bank, under the operation of this system, had drawn from the States in which her branches were situated. All the tables were up to the year 1831, the period to which the last investigating committee had brought up their inquiries. One of these statements showed the amount abstracted from the whole Union; it was $40,040,622 20; another showed the amount taken from the Southern and Western States; it was $22,523,387 94; another showed the amount taken from the branch at New Orleans; it was $12,815,798 10. Such, said Mr. B., has been the result of the experiment to diffuse a national paper currency over this extended Union. Twice in eighteen years it has totally failed, leaving the country exhausted of its specie, and destitute of paper. This was proof enough, but there was still another mode of proving the same thing; it was the fact of the present amount of United States Bank notes in circulation. Mr. B. had heard with pain the assertion made in so many memorials presented to the Senate, that there was a great scarcity of currency; that the Bank of the United States had been obliged to contract her circulation in consequence of the removal of the deposits, and that her notes had become so scarce that none could be found; and strongly contrasting the present dearth which now prevails with the abundant plenty of these notes which reigned over a happy land before that fatal measure came to blast a state of unparalleled prosperity. The fact was, Mr. B. said, that the actual circulation of the bank is greater now than it was before the removal of the deposits; greater than it has been in any month but one for upwards of a year past. The discounts were diminished, he said, but the circulation was increased.

Mr. B. then exhibited a table of the actual circulation of the Bank of the United States for the whole year 1833, and for the two past months of the present year, and stated it to be taken from the monthly statements of the bank, as printed and laid upon the tables of members. It was the nett circulation—the quantity of notes and checks actually out—excluding all that were on the road returning to the branch banks, called notes in transitu, and which would not be counted till again issued by the branch to which they were returned.

The following is the table:

By comparing the circulation of each month, as exhibited on this table, Mr. B. said, it would be seen that the quantity of United States Bank notes now in circulation is three quarters of a million greater than it was in October last, and a million and a half greater than it was in January, 1833. How, then, are we to account for this cry of no money, in which so many respectable men join? It is in the single fact of their flow to the Northeast? The pigeons, which lately obscured the air with their numbers, have all taken their flight to the North! But pigeons will return of themselves, whereas these bank notes will never return till they are purchased with gold and silver, and brought back. Mr. B. then alluded to a petition from a meeting in his native State, North Carolina, and in which one of his esteemed friends, (Mr. Carson,) late a member of the House of Representatives, was a principal actor, and which stated the absolute disappearance of United States Bank notes from all that region of country. Certainly the petition was true in that statement; but it is equally true that it was mistaken in supposing that the circulation of the bank was diminished. The table which he had read had shown the contrary; it showed an increase, instead of a diminution, of the circulation. The only difference was that it had all left that part of the country, and that it would do forever! If a hundred millions of United States Bank notes were carried to the upper parts of North Carolina, and put into circulation, it would be but a short time before the whole would have fallen into the current which sweeps the paper of that bank to the Northeast. Mr. B. said there were four other classes of proof which he could bring in, but it would be a consumption of time, and a work of supererogation. He would not detail them, but state their heads: 1. One was the innumerable orders which the mother bank had forwarded to her branches to send on specie and bills of exchange to redeem their circulation—to pour in re-enforcements to the points to which their circulation tends; 2. Another was in the examination of Mr. Biddle, president of the bank, by the investigating committee, in 1832, in which this absorbing tendency of the branch paper to flow to the Northeast was fully charged and admitted; 3. A third was in the monthly statement of the notes in transitu, which amount to an average of four millions and a half for the last twelve months, making fifty millions for the year; and which consist, by far the greater part, of branch notes and checks redeemed in the Northeast, purchased back by the branches, and on their way back to the place from which they issued; and 4. The last class of proof was in the fact, that the branches north of the Potomac, being unable or unwilling to redeem these notes any longer, actually ceased to redeem them last fall, even when taken in revenue payment to the United States, until coerced by the Secretary of the Treasury; and that they will not be redeemed for individuals now, and are actually degenerating into a mere local currency. Upon these proofs and arguments, Mr. B. rested his case, and held it to be fully established, first, by argument, founded in the nature of bank circulation over an extended territory; and secondly, by proof, derived from the operation of the present Bank of the United States, that neither the present bank, nor any one that the wisdom of man can devise, can ever succeed in diffusing a general paper circulation over the States of this Union.

VI. Dropping every other objection to the bank—looking at it purely and simply as a supplier of national currency—he, Mr. B., could not consent to prolong the existence of the present bank. Certainly a profuse issue of paper at all points—an additional circulation of even a few millions poured out at the destitute points—would make currency plenty for a little while, but for a little while only. Nothing permanent would result from such a measure. On the contrary, in one or two years, the destitution and distress would be greater than it now is. At the same time, it is completely in the power of the bank, at this moment, to grant relief, full, adequate, instantaneous relief! In making this assertion, Mr. B. meant to prove it; and to prove it, he meant to do it in a way that should reach the understanding of every candid and impartial friend that the bank possessed; for he meant to discard, and drop from the inquiry, all his own views upon the subject; to leave out of view every statement made, and every opinion entertained, by himself, and his friends, and proceed to the inquiry upon the evidence of the bank alone—upon that evidence which flowed from the bank directory itself, and from the most zealous, and best informed of its friends on this floor. Mr. B. assumed that a mere cessation to curtail discounts, at this time, would be a relief—that it would be the salvation of those who were pressed—and put an end to the cry of distress; he averred that this curtailment must now cease, or the bank must find a new reason for carrying it on; for the old reason is exhausted, and cannot apply. Mr. B. then took two distinct views to sustain his position; one founded in the actual conduct and present condition of the bank itself, and the other in a comparative view of the conduct and condition of the former Bank of the United States, at the approaching period of its dissolution.

First: as to the conduct and condition of the present bank.

Mr. B. appealed to the knowledge of all present for the accuracy of his assertion, when he said that the bank had now reduced her discounts, dollar for dollar, to the amount of public deposits withdrawn. The adversaries of the bank said the reduction was much larger than the abstraction; but he dropped that, and confined himself strictly to the admissions and declarations of the bank itself. Taking then the fact to be, as the bank alleged it to be, that she had merely brought down her business in proportion to the capital taken from her, it followed of course that there was no reason for reducing her business any lower. Her relative position—her actual strength—was the same now that it was before the removal; and the old reason could not be available for the reduction of another dollar. Next, as to her condition. Mr. B. undertook to affirm, and would quickly prove, that the general condition of the bank was better now than it had been for years past; and that the bank was better able to make loans, or to increase her circulation, than she was in any of those past periods in which she was so lavishly accommodating the public. For the proof of this, Mr. B. had recourse to her specie fund, always the true test of a bank's ability, and showed it to be greater now than it had been for two years past, when her loans and circulation were so much greater than they are now. He took the month of May, 1832, when the whole amount of specie on hand was $7,890,347 59; when the nett amount of notes in circulation was $21,044,415; and when the total discounts were $70,428,070 72: and then contrasted it with the condition of the bank at this time, that is to say, in the month of February last, when the last return was made; the same items stand thus: specie $10,523,385 69; nett amount of notes in circulation, $19,260,472; total discounts, $54,842,973 64. From this view of figures, taken from the official bank returns, from which it appeared that the specie in the bank was nearly three millions greater than it was in May, 1832, her nett circulation nearly two millions less, and her loans and discounts upwards of fifteen millions less, Mr. B. would submit it to all candid men to say whether the bank is not more able to accommodate the community now than she was then? At all events, he would demand if she was not now able to cease pressing them?

Secondly: as to the comparative condition and conduct of the first Bank of the United States at the period of its approaching dissolution.

Mr. B. took the condition of the bank from Mr. Gallatin's statement of its affairs to Congress, made in January, 1811, just three months before the charter expired; and which showed the discounts and loans of the bank to be $14,578,294 25, her capital being $10,000,000; so that the amount of her loans, three months before her dissolution, was nearly in proportion—near enough for all practical views—to the proportion which the present loans of the Bank of the United States bear to its capital of thirty-five millions. Fifty per cent. upon the former would give fifteen millions; fifty per cent. upon the latter would give fifty-two millions and a half. To make the relative condition of the two banks precisely equal, it will be sufficient that the loans and discounts of the present bank shall be reduced to fifty-two millions by the month of January, 1836: that is to say, it need not make any further sensible reduction of its loans for nearly two years to come. Thus, the mere imitation of the conduct of the old bank will be a relief to the community. A mere cessation to curtail, will put an end to the distress, and let the country go on, quietly and regularly, in its moneyed operations. If the bank will not do this—if it will go on to curtail—it is bound to give some new reason to the country. The old reason, of the removal of the deposits, will no longer answer. Mr. B. had no faith in that reason from the beginning, but he was now taking the bank upon her own evidence, and trying her upon her own reasons, and he held it to be impossible for her to go on without the production of a reason. The hostility of the Government—rather an incomprehensible, and altogether a gratuitous reason, from the beginning—will no longer answer. The Government in 1811 was as hostile to the old bank, as the Government now is to this one; and rather more so. Both Houses of Congress were then hostile to it, and hostile unto death! For they let it die! die on the day appointed by law for its death, without pity, without remorse, without the reprieve of one day. The Government can do no worse now. The Secretary of the Treasury has removed the deposits; and that account is settled by the reduction of an equal amount of loans and discounts. The rest depends upon the Government, and the hostility of the Government cannot go further than to kill the bank, and cannot kill it more dead than the old bank was killed in 1811. Mr. B. had a further comparison to draw between the conduct of the old bank and the present one. The old bank permitted her discounts to remain at their maximum to the very end of her charter; she discounted sixty days' paper up to the last day of her existence; while this bank has commenced a furious curtailment two years and a half before the expiration of her charter. Again: the old bank had not an hour, as a corporation, to wind up her business after the end of her charter; this bank has the use of all her corporate faculties, for that purpose, for two years after the end of her charter. Again: the present bank pretends that she will have to collect the whole of her debts within the period limited for winding up her affairs: the old bank took upwards of twelve years after the expiration of her charter, to collect hers! She created a trust; she appointed trustees, all the debts and credits, were put into their hands, the trustees proceeded like any other collectors, giving time to all debtors who would secure the debt, pay interest punctually, and discharge the principal by instalments. This is what the old bank did, and she did not close her affairs until the 16th of June, in the year 1823. The whole operation was conducted so gently, that the public knew nothing about it. The cotemporaries of the dissolution of the bank, knew nothing about its dissolution. And this is what the present bank may do, if it pleases. That it has not done so—that it is now grinding the community, and threatening to grind them still harder, is a proof of the dangerous nature of a great moneyed power, and should be a warning to the people who now behold its conduct—who feel its gripe, and hear its threat—never to suffer the existence of such another power in our free and happy land.

VII. Mr. B. deprecated the spirit which seemed to have broken out against State banks: it was a spirit which augured badly for the rights of the States. Those banks were created by the States; and the works of the States ought to be respected; the stock in those banks was held by American citizens, and ought not to be injuriously assailed to give value to stock held in the Federal bank by foreigners and aliens. The very mode of carrying on the warfare against State banks, has itself been an injury, and a just cause of complaint. Some of the most inconsiderable have been picked out—their affairs presented in the most unfavorable light—and then held forth as a fair sample of the whole. How much more easy would it have been to have acted a more grateful, and a more equitable part! a part more just to the State Governments which created those banks, and the American citizens who held stock in them! Instead of hunting out for remote and inconsiderable banks, and instituting a most disparaging scrutiny into their small affairs, and making this high Senate the conspicuous theatre for the exhibition of their insignificance, why not take the higher order of the State banks?—those whose names and characters are well known? whose stock upon the exchange of London and New York, is superior to that of the United States Bank? whose individual deposits are greater than those of the rival branches of the Bank of the United States, seated in their neighborhood? whose bills of exchange are as eagerly sought for as those of the Federal bank? which have reduced exchange below the rates of the Federal bank? and which, in every particular that tries the credit, is superior to the one which is receiving so much homage and admiration? Mr. B. said there were a plenty of such State banks as he had described; they were to be found in every principal city, from New Orleans to Boston. Some of them had been selected for deposit banks, others not; but there was no difficulty in making a selection of an ample number.

This spirit of hostility to the State banks, Mr. B. said, was of recent origin, and seemed to keep pace with the spirit of attack upon the political rights of the States. When the first Federal bank was created, in the year 1791, it was not even made, by its charter, a place of deposit for the public moneys. Mr. Jefferson preferred the State banks at that time, and so declared himself in his cabinet opinion to President Washington. Mr. Gallatin deposited a part of the public moneys in the State banks during the whole of the long period that he was at the head of the Treasury. At the dissolution of the first Bank of the United States, he turned over all the public moneys which he held in deposit to these banks, taking their obligation to pay out all the Treasury warrants drawn upon them in gold and silver, if desired by the holder. When the present bank was chartered, the State banks stood upon an equal footing with the Federal bank, and were placed upon an equality with it as banks of deposit, in the very charter which created the Federal bank. Mr. B. was alluding to the 14th fundamental article of the constitution of the bank—the article which provided for the establishment of branches—and which presented an argument in justification of the removal of the deposits which the adversaries of that measure most pertinaciously decline to answer. The Government wanted banks of deposit, not of circulation; and by that article, the State banks are made just as much banks of deposit for the United States as the Bank of the United States is. They are put upon exact equality, so far as the Federal Government is concerned; for she stipulates but for one single branch of the United States Bank, and that to be placed at Washington city. As for all other branches, their establishment was made to depend—not on the will, or power, of the Federal Government—not on any supposed or real necessity on her part to have the use of such branches—but upon contingencies over which she had no control; contingencies depending, one upon the mere calculation of profit and loss by the bank itself, the other upon the subscriptions of stock within a State, and the application of its legislature. In these contingencies, namely, if the Bank of the United States thought it to her interest to establish branches in the States, she might do it; or, if 2,000 shares of stock were subscribed for in a State, and thereupon an application was made by the State legislature for the institution of a branch, then its establishment within the State became obligatory upon the bank. In neither contingency had the will, the power, or the necessities of the Federal Government, the least weight, concern, or consideration, in the establishment of the branch. If not established, and so far as the Government is concerned, it might not be, then the State banks, selected by the United States Bank, and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, were to be the banks of deposit for the Federal moneys. This was an argument, Mr. B. said, in justification of the removal of the deposits, and in favor of the use of the State banks which gentlemen on the opposite side of the question—gentlemen who take so much pains to decry State banks—have been careful not to answer. But it is not the only argument in favor of those banks which can be drawn from the legislation of the same Congress which chartered the Federal bank. He alluded to the joint resolution of 1816, for the better collection of the Federal revenue. That resolution admitted the notes of all specie paying State banks to receivability in payment of Federal dues. It was a resolution of cardinal importance for the regulation of local paper currency, and, with an amendment, might be made the efficient instrument of restraining, and eventually suppressing, the small note circulation. Mr. B. was of opinion that this resolution, and the effect it had had in rectifying and purifying a disordered currency, had been too much overlooked. The homage of the day had been directed to another object. The very authors of the resolution seem to have dropped it from their affections, and that for the purpose of doing honor to another object which was formerly a stranger to their affections. Mr. B. would endeavor to correct this oversight, and to supply the defect of this natural affection. He would bring forward the orphan resolution from the obscurity in which it had lain for eighteen years, and place it before the public in a proper and becoming point of view. It emanated from the same Congress which chartered the Bank of the United States, and was deemed a far more efficient remedy than that bank, for rectifying the disordered currency of the day. Its professed object was to regulate the paper currency of the State banks, and to regulate it by the power of the Federal Government, through the agency of the Treasury Department. This was the object of the resolution; and the mode of accomplishing that object was as obvious and simple in its suggestion, as it was efficacious and certain in its operation. It was merely for Congress to use its authority over the collection of the revenue, and to resolve that none but specie paying banks should have their notes received in payments to the Federal Government! This brief enactment drew the line between good and bad banks; between current and uncurrent paper. It sunk one, and raised the other. The resolution was passed on the 30th day of April, 1816—just twenty days after the passage of the act to establish the present Bank of the United States—a circumstance which strongly implies that the Congress which granted the charter to the bank, did not consider that bank, but this resolution, as the true remedy for a disordered currency, and the proper regulator of the local banks. This implication, so clearly resulting from the premises, becomes an established proposition, when it is seen, by looking deeper into the origin of the resolution, that it was not only passed after the bank charter was granted, but that it was introduced into the House of Representatives after the passage of that charter, and that it owes its first conception to a speech delivered in opposition to that charter, in which it was wisely asserted, and elaborately argued, that the Federal Government, and not a national bank, was the true corrector and regulator of local bank currency; and that the exclusion of non-specie-paying bank notes from payments to the Federal Government, was the true, and the only true, remedy for the enormous disorders which then prevailed in the paper currency of the States. Mr. B. said, there was at that time a general suspension of specie payments among the banks. The people were using unconvertible paper. A mass of fifty millions of such paper was supposed to be afloat; and to infuse life and heat into this mass—to act directly upon it—and to draw the line between that which was dead, and that which only slept, the joint resolution of 1816 was passed, and the power of the Federal Government brought to bear directly upon it. It was argued, and well argued, at the time, and by those who were entirely friendly to national banks,* that the introduction of a new paper circulation was not the remedy for a disordered paper currency; that the present national bank, then under discussion, was not the remedy; that the engine for Congress to use was its own revenue system, and the interdiction, from revenue payments, of all local paper which was not precisely equivalent to gold and silver; that gold and silver was the legal currency of the United States; that the framers of the constitution were hard money men; and that it was the legitimate office of Congress to hold the State banks to the test of specie payments; that the new Bank of the United States, independent of its connexion with the Government, would not be able to get its notes into circulation; and that the whole strength of the Government ought to be put forth to compel the payment of the duties and taxes to the Federal Government in the legal currency of the country, that is to say, in gold and silver; that in the end the revenue must be paid in this legal currency, and the sooner that was brought about the better.

Mr. B. said it was not for the purpose of raising contrasts, that he had gone so radically into the origin of this joint resolution, but to show the opinions of the Congress which chartered this bank, and to enable him to prove the truth of these opinions, as verified by the events of succeeding years. His great position was, that this bank had not reformed the disordered paper currency of 1816, but that this joint resolution had done it! This was his position! To sustain it, he should appeal to facts, not confined to books and documents inaccessible to the people, but diffused throughout the country, and existing in the knowledge of every citizen who had arrived at years of discretion in 1816, and had remained of sound mind and memory since. The facts were these: That, within eighteen months after this bank went into operation, it ceased operation as a bank of circulation; that in April, 1819, it was virtually insolvent, owing the State banks more than it could pay, and only living from day to day by their mercy; that a committee of Congress had reported its charter to be violated, in four specified cases; that resolutions were successively offered in Congress, 1, to order out a scire facias against the bank to vacate its charter; 2, to bring in a bill to repeal the charter without the formality of a scire facias; 3, to direct the removal of the deposits; 4, to forbid the notes of the bank from being received in payment of public dues. The consequence of all these events was, that the bank, in the second year of its existence, ceased to do business as a bank of circulation; its branches were nearly all shut up; in the South and West not a note was put out; no currency of any kind issued from them; and this state of things continued till 1827, when the spurious checks began to be put into circulation, and which, since the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Brewster, the counterfeiter, are given up as illegal. But it is not necessary to go further into the misconduct of the bank. The position on which he, Mr. B., had taken his stand, was, that the Bank of the United States did not reform the paper currency of 1816; the proof is, that the bank, for all the purposes of supplying a currency, was a dead institution from the second year of its existence to 1827; and the fact is, that within this period, the local currency was reformed, and has remained so ever since. The conclusion is inevitable, that it was the joint resolution of 1816 that did it! And who made that resolution? The people's representatives! Their agents and servants in Congress made it, that is to say, the people themselves made it, for they make their representatives, and through their representatives act in Congress. It is the people themselves, then, who did reform the disordered currency of 1816; it is they who can now prevent it from becoming disordered; and this is the answer which ought to be given, and will be given, to every demand, to every inquiry, that supposes the Bank of the United States to be necessary to control the future currency of the State banks. Yes, said Mr. B., with great emphasis, it was the joint resolution of 1816—it was the power of the Government itself, acting upon the local paper currencies, through its revenue system, through its custom-house, land offices, post offices, district attorneys' and marshals' offices, and its Federal courts, that reformed these currencies, after the great disorders of the war; that did it while the Bank of the United States was prostrate and powerless—while she was a pauper upon the parish of the United States, a criminal at the bar of Congress! and it was not to be endured that that bank should now claim the merit of a reformation which it never effected, and be held up to the people as the only true and safe regulator of local currencies in all time to come.

Standing upon the inattackerable position that it was the joint resolution of 1816 which had reformed the disordered paper currency of that day—that it was this resolution which had acted upon the mass of depreciated paper itself—that it had communicated heat and life into that mortified mass of the body politic—that it had given health and soundness to fifty millions of unconvertible bank notes—after seeing these wonders performed by the resolution, he must be permitted to believe that the same medicine which had worked the miracle of raising the dead, would now be able to effect the comparatively easy operation of keeping the living alive! of preserving the sound whole! The State banks were now all paying specie for their notes; there were about 500 specie paying banks in the Union; and the credit of many of these, in the first money markets of Europe and America,—upon the exchange of New York and London—was far superior to that of the Bank of the United States. The joint resolution of 1816, which restored them to specie payments, can hold them on to specie payments! Without alteration, or amendment, that resolution can continue to perform its high and goodly function; but it can be made still better; and especially can be made the instrument, in conjunction with gold, of restraining, and eventually suppressing, the whole circulation of bank notes under the denomination of twenty dollars. The evils of a small paper circulation, he considered among the greatest grievances that could afflict a community. The evils were innumerable, and fell almost exclusively upon those who were least able to bear them, or to guard against them. If a bank stops payment, the holders of the small notes, who are usually the working part of the community, are the last to find it out, and the first to suffer. If counterfeiting is perpetrated, it is chiefly the small notes which are selected for imitation, because they are most current among those who know the least about notes, and who are most easily made the dupes of imposition, and the victims of fraud. As the expeller of hard money, small notes were the bane and curse of a country. A nation is scarce, or abundant, in hard money, precisely in the degree in which it tolerates the lower denominations of bank notes. France tolerates no note less than $100, and has a gold and silver circulation of 350 millions of dollars. England tolerates no note of less than $25, and has a gold and silver circulation of 130 millions of dollars; in the United States, where $5 is the minimum size of the Federal bank notes, the whole specie circulation, including what is in the banks, does not amount to thirty millions of dollars. To increase the quantity of hard money in the United States, and to supply the body of the people with an adequate specie currency to serve for their daily wants, and ordinary transactions, the bank note circulation below twenty dollars, ought to be suppressed. If Congress could pass a law to that effect, it ought to be done, but it cannot pass such a law; it has no constitutional power to pass it. Congress can, however, do something else, which will, in time, effectually put down such a currency. It can discard it, and disparage it. It can reject it from all Federal payments. It can reject the whole circulation of any bank that will continue to issue small notes. Their rejection from all Federal payments, would check their currency, and confine the orbit of their circulation to the immediate neighborhood of the issuing bank. The bank itself would find but little profit from issuing them—public sentiment would come to the aid of Federal policy. The people of the States, when countenanced and sustained by the Federal Government, would indulge their natural antipathy and honest detestation of a small paper currency. They would make war upon all small notes. The State legislatures would be under the control of the people, and the States that should first have the wisdom to limit their paper circulation to a minimum of twenty dollar bills, would immediately fill up with gold and silver. The common currency would be entirely metallic; and there would be a broad and solid basis for a superstructure of large notes; while the States which continued to tolerate the small notes; would be afflicted with all the evils of a most pestilential part of the paper system,—small notes, part counterfeit, part uncured, half worn out, and all incapable of being used with any regard to a beneficial economy. Mr. B. went on to depict the evils of a small note currency, which he looked upon as the bane and curse of the laboring part of the community, and the reproach and opprobrium of any Government that tolerated it. He said that the Government which suffered its currency to fall into such a state that the farmer, the artisan, the market man, the day laborer, and the hired servant, could only be paid in small bank notes, was a Government which abdicated one of its most sacred duties, and became an accomplice on the part of the strong in the oppression of the weak.

Mr. B. placed great reliance upon the restoration of the gold currency for putting down a small note circulation. No man would choose to carry a bundle of small bank notes in his pocket, even new and clean ones, much less old, ragged, and filthy ones, when he could get gold in their place. A limitation upon the receivability of these notes, in payment of Federal dues, would complete their suppression. It is in this point of view that the joint resolution of 1816 may be beneficially amended. There is nothing in that resolution to prevent the Secretary of the Treasury from making the limitation himself; and the object of the amendment that he proposed would be to compel a reluctant Secretary to do what he has a discretion to do, and to make it matter of law, and not of departmental discretion, to keep the power of the Government steadily bearing upon the small note circulation, until that pestiferous trash should disappear from the land. The Secretary is now to select the local banks whose notes may be received on account of Federal dues. He may give the notes a partial or a general receivability. He is under no obligation by law, or charter, to admit the notes of any bank to be received but those of the Bank of the United States. All others are at his discretion. There is nothing in the present resolution of 1816 to prevent him from permitting local notes of less than five dollars to be received; and yet he has excluded all such. The only limitation upon him is as to their specie character; with respect to all the rest, it is matter of discretion. No local bank has a right, by law or charter, to have any part of its circulation received. It is matter of favor to receive any part of it; and the policy and interest of the United States may say how far that favor may go. The Secretary may say it now; the joint resolution of 1816 is a carte blanche authority for him in that particular; but Mr. B. would prefer legal enactments to departmental discretion, even where he had every confidence in the Secretary, and, therefore, he would, at the proper time, propose that this resolution—to make it the instrument of restraining a small note currency, as well as of regulating local currencies—should be amended, so that, 1, after the expiration of the charter of the Bank of the United States (which now has the chartered right of tendering five and ten dollar notes to the United States) no note should be received on account of the Federal Government, or of the Post Office Department, of less denomination than twenty dollars; 2, nor the note of any bank which would continue to issue notes of less than five (or ten) dollars amount; 3, nor any note which should not be payable, at the place where issued, in gold and silver. These amendments, with the restoration of the gold currency—the admission of foreign coins to circulation, and raising them to their just value—would put the currency of the Union on a footing of accommodation and safety, to all classes of the community, namely, gold and silver for common currency, and large bank notes for special occasions and large operations. Mr. B. did not aspire to the felicity of seeing as fine a currency in the United States as there is France, where there was no bank note under five hundred francs, and where there was a gold and silver circulation at the rate of eleven dollars a head for each man, woman, and child, in the kingdom, namely, three hundred and fifty millions of dollars for a population of thirty-two millions of souls, but he did aspire to the comparative happiness of seeing as good currency established for ourselves, by ourselves, as our old fellow-subjects—the people of old England—now possess from their king, lords, and commons. They—he spoke of England proper—had no bank note less than five pounds sterling, and they possessed a specie circulation (of which three-fourths was gold) at the rate of about nine dollars a head, men, women, children (even paupers) included; namely, about one hundred and thirty millions for a population of fourteen millions. He, Mr. B., must be allowed to aspire to the happiness of possessing, and in his sphere to labor to acquire, as good a circulation as these English have; and that would be an immeasurable improvement upon our present condition. We have local bank notes of one, two, three, four dollars; we have Federal bank notes of five and ten dollars—the notes of those English who are using gold at home while we are using their paper here—we have not a particle of gold, and not more silver than at the rate of about two dollars a head, men, women, children (even slaves) included; namely, about thirty millions of silver for a population of thirteen millions. Mr. B. believed there was not upon the face of the earth, a country whose actual currency was in a more deplorable condition than that of the United States was at present; the bitter fruit of that fatal paper system which was brought upon us, with the establishment of the first Bank of the United States in 1791, and which will be continued upon us until the citadel of that system—the Bastille of paper money—the present Bank of the United States, shall cease to exist.

Mr. B. said, that he was not the organ of the President on this floor—he had no authority from the President to speak his sentiments to the Senate. Even if he knew them, it would be unparliamentary, and irregular, to state them. There was a way for the Senate to communicate with the President, which was too well known to every gentleman to require any indication from him. But he might be permitted to suggest—in the absence of all regular information—that if any Senator wished to understand, and to comment upon, the President's opinions on currency, he might, perhaps, come something nearer to the mark, by commenting on what he (Mr. B.) had been saying, than by having recourse to the town meeting reports of inimical bank committees.

Mr. B. concluded with showing the difference between the state of the country at this time, when the second Bank of the United States is about to expire, and the state of the country in 1811, when the expiration of the first bank took place. His object was, to prevent any inference from being drawn from what occurred then to what may happen now. The times are changed, and bear no analogy to each other. The bank of 1791 expired on the eve of the late war with Great Britain and the Indians, and left the currency of the country in the condition to which the paper system had reduced it; gold expelled; foreign coins undervalued and discouraged; the channels of circulation filled with small bank notes; and the country covered with local banks. The war came upon the country in this state of its currency, and every incident tended to make things worse. The demands for money increased, the supplies diminished. New loans and new taxes succeeded each other; commerce, which filled our coffers in times of peace, was then broken up. During the whole war, the Government was a borrower, instead of a depositor. It became the servant of the local banks, instead of remaining their master; and would have become the servant and slave of the United States British Bank, if it had continued. It could do nothing to regulate these local banks, until the peace returned, and foreign commerce was pouring in her copious supply of revenue, and made the United States the collector and holder of immense sums. Then the joint resolution of 1816 was passed, and every local bank immediately put to the test of specie payment. But what is the state of things now? Entirely the reverse of that picture! Peace with all the world—foreign commerce prosperous—specie flowing in from abroad—domestic mines discovered—the Mexican and South American mines becoming more productive from the cessation of intestine strife—our national debt paid, taxes reduced—and, to crown all, a President thoroughly devoted to the currency of the constitution and to the interests of the people, and determined to give, so far as it depends upon him, both to the constitution and to the people, a full and fair trial for all their rights. With this advantage, said Mr. B., in the Executive Magistrate, and in this total change of times and entire reversal of circumstances, there is every thing to justify the hope of an auspicious issue to a noble experiment; and nothing to justify the application of an inference from what happened in the gloomy period of 1811, to what may happen in the prosperous period of 1834.

SATURDAY, MARCH 22.

PUBLIC DISTRESS.

After the transaction of some other business—

Mr. WEBSTER rose and said that he had been requested to present to the Senate the proceedings of a meeting held at Chambersburg, in the county of Franklin and State of Pennsylvania, attended by very many of the citizens of that county; and also a memorial respectfully addressed to both Houses of Congress, signed by more than 1,800 of the inhabitants and electors, expressing their opinions, hopes, and fears, in regard to the present condition of public affairs. The presentation of this paper to Congress was attended by the presence of a large committee, composed of persons of the first respectability, who, notwithstanding what they have seen of the numerous applications to Congress—notwithstanding the abundant evidence which has been furnished of the distress pervading all parts of the country, and the necessity of some governmental interference to alleviate that distress, yet had felt it their duty to accompany their memorial to the seat of Government, and to assist in producing a conviction on the two Houses of Congress, that some legislative measures were necessary.

The county of Franklin was one of the most respectable and wealthy in the great State of Pennsylvania. It was situated in a rich limestone valley, and, in its main character, was agricultural. He had the pleasure, last year, to pass through it, and see it for the first time, when its rich fields of wheat and rye were ripening, and, certainly, he little thought then, that he should, at this time, have to present to the Senate such undeniable proofs of their actual, severe, and pressing distress. As he had said, the inhabitants of Franklin county were principally agriculturists, and, of these, the majority were the tillers of their own land. They were interested, also, in manufactures to a great extent; they had ten or twelve forges, and upwards of four thousand persons engaged in the manufacture of iron, dependent for their daily bread on the product of their own labor. The hands employed in this business were a peculiar race—miners, colliers, &c.—and, if other employment was to be afforded them, they would find themselves unsuited for it. These manufactories had been depressed, from causes so well explained, and so well understood, that nobody could now doubt them. They were precisely in the situation of the cotton factories he had adverted to some days ago. There was no demand for their products. The consignee did not receive them—he did not hope to dispose of them, and would not give his paper for them. It was well known that, when a manufactured article was sent to the cities, the manufacturer expected to obtain an advance on them, which he got cashed. This whole operation having stopped, in consequence of the de-range of the currency, the source of business was dried up. There were other manufactories in that county that also felt the pressure—paper factories and manufactories of straw paper, which increased the gains of agriculture. These, too, have been under the necessity of dismissing many of those employed by them, which necessity brought this matter of Executive interference home to every man's labor and property. He had ascertained the prices of produce as now, and in November last, in the State of Pennsylvania, and from these, it would be seen that, in the interior region, on the threshing floors, they had not escaped the evils which had affected the prices of corn and rye at Chambersburg. They were hardly to be got rid of at any price. The loss on wheat, the great product of the county, was thirty cents. clover seed, another great product, had fallen from six dollars per bushel to four dollars. This downfall of agricultural produce described the effect of the measure of the Executive better than all the evidences that had been hitherto offered. These memorialists, for themselves, were sick, sick enough of the Executive experiment. They thought the interests of themselves and the country generally were too important to be made the subject of a rash experiment. They did not come to seek a boon from the Executive—they sought no extraordinary degree of attention from Congress. They only ask that the laws be administered according to their spirit. They ask that the laws might take their course, and secure their social and political rights. They desired that the war going on between the President and the bank may cease. They feel themselves unsafe while this state of hostility continues. They desire to see Congress interpose to check the usurpations of Executive power, which, in the language of a British statesman, has increased, is increasing, and ought to be diminished. Mr. W. said he would only add his solemn conviction of the truth of what the memorialists said, and moved that the memorial and proceedings be referred to the Committee on Finance and printed. The motion was agreed to.

RHODE ISLAND MEMORIALS.

Mr. ROBBINS presented two memorials on the subject of the general distress and pecuniary embarrassments of the country; one from the town of Newport, Rhode Island, and the other from the inhabitants of the towns of Smithfield and Cumberland, in the same State.

In offering these memorials, Mr. ROBBINS addressed the Senate as follows: I am charged with the presentation to Congress of two memorials, coming from the State of Rhode Island; one from the commercial town of Newport, on the seaboard, at the south; the other from the towns of Smithfield and Cumberland, two agricultural and manufacturing towns, at the north limits of the State; and both upon the now all-engrossing concern of this distracted country. Their names are a sufficient guarantee that their memorials speak the words of truth and soberness. They speak of the distress which they are suffering, and of the ruin which is impending over them; and they appeal to Congress to interpose for their relief, by removing the cause, and applying the remedy which has so often been explained here. Nine hundred and fifty names are appended to the memorial from those two northern towns, embracing all professions and all occupations therein, and representing, as I am assured, the united voices of all the inhabitants of both. It would seem that the greatness of their common calamity had hushed every voice but the voice of their common distress. The Newport memorial is preferred by freeholders only. The Senate is probably aware that a freehold, with that people, is a necessary qualification to the right of suffrage. Hence that memorial is confined to freeholders. It was signed by two hundred and fifty-one freeholders of that town, taken both for and against the memorial: of this number, only twenty-six have signed against the memorial; about one-tenth part of the whole number. Yet Newport is the head-quarters of the adherents of the national administration in that State. But if it were not so, I should hope that the free citizens of a free State might petition Congress for a redress of grievances without asking leave of those adherents; and I should hope, too, it would not depend on those adherents whether such a petition should be accredited by Congress. The population of Newport is about eight thousand; they are mostly engaged in commercial pursuits, for which they are admirably suited, having the finest harbor in the world. Their enterprise and spirit of adventure have carried their navigation and their commerce over every sea, and to every part of the commercial world. They are alike distinguished for intelligence and enterprise; and their commercial character is a happy compound of boldness in adventure, and prudence in calculation. Recently they had begun to turn their attention to manufactures by means of steam power. The success of their experiments had been such as had produced the most sanguine hopes from this new source of growing numbers and wealth and prosperity. But all these hopes have been suddenly, and, as they fear, fatally extinguished by the late pernicious interference of the arbitrary hand of the Executive with the money concerns of the country.

I will now, with the indulgence of the Senate, say a few words of those two northern towns. A brief sketch of their history (and it shall be very brief) will serve as an illustration of the faculties of this country, and of the importance of their development. A small river runs through these towns, called Blackstone river; a narrow stream, of no great volume of water, but perennial and unfailing, and possessing great power from the frequency and greatness of its falls. Prior to 1791, this power had always run to waste, except here and there a saw mill or a grist mill, to supply the exigencies of a sparse neighborhood, and one inconsiderable forge. Since that period, from time to time, and from place to place, that power, instead of running to waste, has been applied to the use of propelling machinery, till the valley of that small river has become the Manchester of America. That power is so unlimited, that scarcely any limitation can be fixed to its capability of progressive increase in its application. That valley, in these towns, already has in it over 30 different establishments; it has in it two millions of fixed capital in those establishments; it has expended in it annually, in the wages of manual labor, five hundred thousand dollars; it has in it one hundred thousand spindles in operation. I should say it had—for one-half of these spindles are already suspended, and the other half soon must be suspended, if the present state of things continues. On the bank of that river the first cotton spindle was established in America. The invention of Arkwright, in 1791, escaped from the jealous prohibitions of England, and planted itself there. It was brought over by a Mr. Slater, who had been a laboring manufacturer in England, but who was not a machinist. He brought it over, not in models, but in his own mind, and fortunately he was blessed with a mind capacious of such things, and which, by its fair fruits, has made him a man of immense fortune, and one of the greatest benefactors to his adopted country. There he made the first essays that laid the foundation of that system which has spread so far and wide in this country, and risen to such a height that it makes a demand annually for two hundred and fifty thousand bales of cotton—about one-fourth of all the cotton crop of all our cotton-growing States; makes for those States, for their staple, the best market in the world, except that of England: it was rapidly becoming to them the best market in the world, not excepting that of England; still better, it was rapidly becoming for them a market to weigh down and preponde-rate in the scale against all the other markets of the world taken together. Now, all those prospects are blasted by one breath of the Executive administration of this country. Now, every thing in that valley, every thing in possession, every thing in prospect, is tottering to its fall. One-half of those one hundred thousand spindles are, as I before stated, already stopped; the other half are still continued, but at a loss to the owners, and purely from charity to the laborers; but this charity has its limit, and regard to their own safety will soon constrain them to stop the other half. Five months ago, had one travelled through that valley and witnessed the scenes then displayed there—their numerous and dense population, all industrious, and thriving, and contented—had heard the busy hum of industry in their hours of labor—the notes of joy in their hours of relaxation—had seen the plenty of their tables, the comforts of their firesides—had, in a word, seen in every countenance the content of every heart; and if that same person should travel through the same valley hereafter, and should find it then deserted, and desolate, and silent as the valley of death, and covered over with the solitary and mouldering ruins of those numerous establishments, he would say, Surely the hand of the ruthless destroyer has been here! Now, if the present state of things is to be continued, as surely as blood follows the knife that has been plunged to the heart, and death ensues, so surely that change there is to take place; and he who ought to have been their guardian angel, will have been that ruthless destroyer. Though it has been denied here that the removal of the deposits was the cause of the distress, it is not denied that it was the cause of the cause; it is not denied that it has produced the destruction of confidence and credit; nor that the destruction of confidence and credit has produced the distress. What signifies it whether the distress stands first or second in the chain of consequences from that measure? All the consequences, mediate as well as immediate, collateral as well as direct, are equally to be ascribed to it. They are all bitter and deadly waters from the same fountain. Will it be said that these collateral consequences were not foreseen, and therefore were not intended by the Executive? Be it so: I believe it was so; but, for that very reason, and especially for that reason, and against all opposing reasons, he ought instantly to undo what he has done. If a project has been attended with a disastrous result, neither intended by it, nor expected from it, it is the most urgent of all reasons (and what heart could resist it?) why it should be instantly abandoned; and especially if that project was a theoretic experiment of Executive administration upon thirteen millions of people, and that result the sudden ruin of the prosperity of that whole people. No friend of the President, I presume, will say that these collateral consequences were foreseen and intended by him; for his bitterest foe could not say more to make him the object of execration now and forever. For what could make a name more detestable to this, and every following age, than to have it identified with a scene of calamity, that will ever be marked as an era in the history of the calamitous periods of this country, and identified with that scene as its criminal author. But the President does not say this—far from it. He denies the fact of distress; he represents that the cry of distress that comes to us from all parts of the country, is not the cry of distress, but its counterfeit; that it is raised for theatrical effect, and for a political purpose; and that purpose to drive him from the stand which he has taken. His friends in this house leave us to suppose, from their silence or their declarations, that they concur with the Executive in this representation. The denial of the fact of distress, in the face of all the evidence before us to establish it, I consider as a moral phenomenon; and to be marked as such in the history of the wanderings of the human mind, extravagant as such phenomena have been. But perhaps it is not wholly unaccountable. We know that the senses do not do their offices without the consent of the conscious mind. The marble column that is standing before us, and which paints itself on the retina of the eye, is not seen, if the mind be so abstracted as to be unconscious of the image. So it was no absurdity, the saying, "Seeing they see not, and hearing they hear not;" for, though a contradiction in sound, it was none in sense. A proof, by-the-by, (and perhaps worthy of a nota-bene in passing,) that the mind is a being per se, and that the senses are its instruments, but no part of itself. The case is somewhat analogous with the human mind, and intellectual objects. The mind cannot see, or will not yield, to the force of evidence, against the predetermined opposition of the will. The only rational and praiseworthy end of eloquence itself, as an art, is to set the will on the side of truth; and the greatest of her victories is a victory over the will. Without that victory, there are cases in which evidence is vain, logic is vain; a miracle, and the greatest of all miracles, would be vain. It was of such obdurate and invincible incredulity, it was said, and by the voice of Divine truth itself, then animating the human form, "If they believe not Moses and the prophets, neither would they believe, though one should be raised from the dead." What could be more astonishing, to one who had not considered the force of the human will in blinding the human understanding to the force of evidence, than the denial of the fact of distress, in the face of all the accumulated and accumulating evidence here to establish it?—to hear it said that the cry of distress is counterfeit, which we hear in all parts of the country—which comes to us authenticated by the names of thousands and tens of thousands of our fellow-citizens, and among them many that are but other names for virtue itself; and borne to us, too, by delegations of the highest grade of character in this country; and their statements, too, corroborated by a thousand facts, which no one denies, and which cannot deceive us?—to hear it said in this Hall, as it has been repeatedly said, that the distress began here; that here it first sounded, and that the complaints we hear are but the echoes of that sound, reverberated to us from all parts of the country? Then we are to suppose that the two hundred and fifty failures in New York, and which are daily increased, are all fictitious failures, made to make a show of distress, not felt, and for political effect; that the sixty failures in New Bedford, one-fourth of all the mercantile houses there, are all fictitious failures, and made to make a show of distress not felt, and for political effect; that the same scene of counterfeit bankruptcy, for the same fraudulent purpose, has been going on in all our commercial towns and cities, and in all our manufacturing districts; that the whole country has agreed to sink the value of all the property in it some fifteen, twenty, or twenty-five per cent. to impose upon the President; that the whole country is in one universal conspiracy, by hanging out false signals of distress, to deceive him, and thereby to induce him to recede from the position he has taken; and to cap the climax, that Nicholas Biddle has done all this—he has bribed the whole country into this conspiracy. The phenomenon is not the less, that these absurdities should be believed, while the fifty thousand witnesses are disbelieved, and they the very sufferers and victims of the distress.

Again: It is said, (and after a few words on this topic I will relieve the attention of the Senate, and resume my seat,) it is said that the deposits were to be removed, whatever might be the consequences, if not now, shortly hereafter; namely, at the expiration of the charter, some two years hence; that the only difference, then, was a difference of time, and the only question a question of time; and at best it could only be a little putting off of the evil day. The removal now, with its collateral consequences now, which have been the destruction of confidence and credit, and a degree of distress that is without a parallel in our history, is certain. But the removal of the deposits, at the expiration of the charter, would not be attended with these collateral consequences, for it could not create the alarm which has produced those consequences. The removal of the deposits then, would be a thing of course, and to be expected in the course of things, and there could be nothing in it to excite alarm. We have a proof of this in our own experience. The deposits were removed from the former bank, at the expiration of its charter, as a thing of course. It gave no alarm; it had none of these collateral effects. The effect of depriving the country of the great resource of a national bank was indeed severe, and was severely felt; but this effect was altogether distinct from the effect of the removal of the deposits. Besides, it is not certain, that if the deposits had not been removed now, that they would have been removed hereafter; for that would depend on the future will of Congress, and that again on the sentiment of the country. I am aware that the honorable gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. FORSYTH,] whose argument I am considering, in order to make good his argument, assumed that the sentiment of the country was decidedly against a bank; but what is more extraordinary, he assumed that it would remain so. Now, there is no dealing with assumptions like this; they have nothing tangible in them; it is like battling with the air; you strike at nothing; at best (to use a Yankee phrase) it is but guessing, and can only be opposed by guessing. But it is enough to say that the removal of the deposits now, with all its collateral evils now, is certain; and it is not certain that a removal would have been made hereafter; and if made hereafter, it is certain it would not have been attended with these collateral evils.

Mr. KNIGHT said, he would not attempt to add anything to what had been said, and so well said, by his colleague, but would only bear his testimony to the character and standing of the memorialists. Those whom I know, said Mr. K., are among the first of our fellow-citizens for industry, intelligence, and enterprise. I have the fullest confidence in their representations. These memorialists, I am informed, are confined to the towns of Smithfield and Cumberland, two of the largest agricultural townships in the State; they both lie on the Blackstone river, and contain within their borders a number of valuable manufacturing villages. In fact, sir, the whole river, from its mouth to near Worcester, is studded with manufacturing villages. In traversing it, nearly forty miles, you are not out of sight of some one of those establishments which are now languishing, as represented by the memorials.

The memorials were then referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

PETERSBURG (VA.) MEMORIAL.

Mr. FORSYTH rose and said, he had been requested to present the memorial of a large number of citizens and voters of Petersburg, Virginia, to the number of 300, approving of the course of the President and Secretary of the Treasury, in removing the public deposits from the Bank of the United States, and praying that they may not be restored. This memorial, and the circumstances attending it, would justify him, Mr. F. said, in accompanying the presentation of it with some remarks; but he had hitherto reprobated it, and he thought the custom more honored in the breach than in the observance. He would, therefore, content himself with moving the reference of the memorial to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LEIGH said, that, by the kindness of the honorable Senator from Georgia, he had had an opportunity of inspecting the names attached to the memorial, and could bear his testimony, from having a personal acquaintance with many of the signers, to the respectability of them. He could not, however, possibly believe that they were all voters of the town of Petersburg, for, being familiarly acquainted with it, he doubted whether there were as many voters in it as 300. But be it as it might, he agreed with the gentleman from Georgia, that their memorial was entitled to the respectful consideration of the Senate. If it was in order, he would avail himself of this opportunity to present the memorial of the citizens of Princess Ann county, and would follow the example of the honorable Senator from Georgia, in saying nothing on the subject; but would only present this memorial to the Senate, feeling satisfied that a document coming from that quarter, or any other quarter, ought to receive, and would receive, the respectful consideration it was entitled to. He then moved that the memorial should be read, printed, and referred.

Both memorials were then referred to the Committee on Finance.

RE-CHARTERING BANK UNITED STATES.

The CHAIR having called the order of the day, being Mr. WEBSTER's bill to continue, for a limited time, the charter of the Bank of the United States,

Mr. BENTON rose, and concluded his remarks, as given entire in preceding pages; when

Mr. WHITE rose, and said that he wished to offer his sentiments on this question, and he would do so then, or on Monday next, as might be the pleasure of the Senate.

Mr. WRIGHT observed, that, as there was much business of an Executive nature before the Senate, undisposed of, he thought the honorable Senator had better proceed with his remarks on Monday next; and he (Mr. W.) would move that the Senate go into the consideration of Executive business.

Mr. WEBSTER wished to accommodate the honorable Senator from Tennessee, in allowing him to proceed to address the Senate, if it might be convenient to himself; but he hoped gentlemen would come on Monday prepared to be diligent; for, unless they should then take the question, he hoped he should not be deemed wanting in courtesy, if he endeavored to protract their daily sittings, in order to take the question at an early day.

Mr. CLAY hoped that the honorable Senator from Tennessee would proceed, if convenient to himself. The debate on the subject of his resolutions had long been protracted, and should in some short time be brought to a close. He therefore trusted that there would be a general concurrence on the part of the Senate, to prolong the daily sessions for that purpose. The debate ought to be brought to a close next week; for it had already lasted long enough for any one to have gone to Europe and returned.

Mr. WHITE expressed himself willing to proceed, when the Senate should think proper.

Mr. WRIGHT renewed his motion to go into the consideration of Executive business; which was agreed to.

The Senate then went into the consideration of Executive business; and, after the doors were re-opened,

The Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, MARCH 24.

LYNN (MASS.) MEMORIAL.

Mr. WEBSTER presented a memorial signed by nine hundred of the inhabitants of the town of Lynn, in the State of Massachusetts, remonstrating against the removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States, and praying for their restoration, with such other measures as Congress may deem expedient.

Those members of the Senate, said Mr. W., who have travelled from Boston to Salem, or to Nahant, will remember the town of Lynn. It is a beautiful town, situated upon the sea, is highly industrious, and has been hitherto prosperous and flourishing. With a population of eight thousand souls, its great business is the manufacture of shoes. Three thousand persons, men, women, and children, are engaged in this manufacture. They make and sell, ordinarily, two millions of pairs of shoes a year, for which, at 75 cents a pair, they receive one million five hundred thousand dollars. They consume half a million of dollars worth of leather, of which they buy a large portion in Philadelphia and Baltimore, and the rest in their own neighborhood. The articles manufactured by them are sent to all parts of the country, finding their way into every principal port, from Eastport round to St. Louis. Now, sir, when I was last among the people of this handsome town, all was prosperity and happiness. Their business was not extravagantly profitable; they were not growing rich over fast, but they were comfortable, all employed, and all satisfied and contented. But, sir, with them, as with others, a most serious change has taken place. They find their usual employments suddenly arrested, from the same cause which has smitten other parts of the country with like effects; and they have sent forward a memorial, which I have now the honor of laying before the Senate. This memorial, sir, is signed by nine hundred of the legal voters of the town; and I understand the largest number of votes known to have been given is one thousand. Their memorial is short; it complains of the illegal removal of the deposits, of the attack on the bank, and of the effect of these measures on their business. One of their committee, sir, has brought on this memorial, and I learn from him facts, so clearly illustrative of the evil consequences of the Secretary's proceedings, that I must pray a moment's indulgence to state them.

The case of these memorialists shows fully and exactly the beneficial operation of the bank, and the effect of embarrassing or discontinuing its operations. The manufacturers of Lynn, as I have already said, send their articles to every State in the Union; and they there sell them to wholesale and retail dealers. For the proceeds of the sales they draw their bills on time, and these bills are discounted; they receive cash for them, and the bills go forward to be paid in due time. They have found no difficulty in cashing their bills, at a rate of discount not exceeding three-fourths of one per cent., though drawn on the most distant places; and thus they have been able to realize an advance upon their articles so soon as shipped, and with this advance have been ready to buy new stock and go on with their operations. But the Executive Government has broken up all this. These manufacturers cannot now sell their bills but with extreme difficulty, and when they do sell them at all, they do it through the agency of brokers, and at a discount of three per cent. They lose, therefore, two dollars and a quarter in every hundred, by losing the former facilities of exchange. But there are other and still greater losses. In the present state of things, the manufacturers are unwilling to buy stock, and afraid to enter into any new engagements. They cannot, therefore, employ labor as formerly, and a state of confusion and embarrassment has consequently ensued. Three hundred hands, I am informed, have been dismissed from their employment, even since the date of the memorial, and others must be dismissed. The means of living are thus snatched suddenly away from whole classes of industrious and worthy men, and their families threatened with want. And now, sir, I beg leave to ask gentlemen who support the measures of the administration, what I am to say to these people? What answer am I to give them, when they ask me what is to be done for their relief? When am I to inform them the experiment will be ended? I am the more anxious that they should furnish me with some answer, because I perceive that the business of memorializing Congress, instead of being nearly through, is but just begun. I perceive that petitions and committees are coming from all quarters, from all classes, and from all parties, in constant and rapid succession, evincing a fixed resolution amongst the people not to fall, silent and uncomplaining victims, under acts of Government equally illegal and preposterous. If I mistake not, the spirit of the country is rising. The people think the Government of the country is their Government; the interests which it should protect their interests; and they have had enough, quite enough, of Executive experiments.

Mr. President, when will this foolish experiment be abandoned? All men may commit errors, but wise men, and candid men, will retract them so soon as they see them to be errors. They will not adhere to error, in spite of experience, and grow more obstinate and more angry, in proportion as that error becomes more and more manifest. Sir, we have come to a pass, in which attachment to preconceived opinions, and to hastily adopted purposes, must give way to truth and reason. The times are becoming too sober, quite too sober, for any man, or any set of men, to make a stubborn point of what they may call their own consistency. The country must be saved; and the people must save it by compelling those who have adopted ruinous measures, to retrace their steps, if they will not retrace them of their own free will, having seen their utter and absolute failure, and the enormous mischiefs which they have produced.

The memorial was then referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

YORK (PA.) MEMORIAL.

The VICE PRESIDENT stated to the Senate, that he had received a communication from James Lewis and Adam King, the committee appointed by a meeting of a portion of the people of York, held on the 4th of March last, to communicate the proceedings of that meeting to the Chair, to be laid before the Senate—that the committee in their communication express their regret that any inadvertence in the performance of the duties enjoined upon them by the meeting, had led to the transmission of a paper to the Senate which was not directed to be sent, and was not proper to be received—that they now enclosed, and asked the Chair to lay before the Senate, such portion of the proceedings as the meeting intended for it—that they would have preferred to vary the language of some of the resolutions, but have not the power—that they cannot however find in them any disrespect to either House of Congress, and that they are confident none was intended by the meeting—that it is with reluctance they again bring the subject to the notice of the Chair, but that without doing so, they would consider themselves as having unperformed their obligation to their fellow-citizens. The paper now communicated was stated by the Chair to be the resolutions only which had on a former occasion been read to the Senate, without any portion of the preamble then attached to it. The Chair further stated, that the Senate having heretofore decided not to receive the proceedings of this meeting in the form in which they were then presented, the Chair thought it due to the Senate to leave to its decision the question how far the objections then raised to them have been obviated by the condition in which they are now presented, and by the explanations of the committee, which would be read.

Mr. CLAY inquired whether the Presiding Officer thought the paper was couched in respectful language?

The CHAIR replied, that it had on a former occasion given its views as to the character of the expressions used in the resolution which was deemed most objectional, and which the Chair briefly repeated; but that under the circumstances of the case, and in view of what had already taken place, the Chair thought it consistent with its duty, and most just to the body, to take its own sense upon that question.

Mr. CLAY said, by the rules and practice of both Houses of Congress, whenever a paper like this was presented, the person presenting it vouched for the respect-fulness of its language. If the person did not so vouch, the paper could not be received. He understood that the Presiding Officer declined doing so, and therefore it ought not to be received. The paper did not come to the Senate in the form it ought to come. He therefore moved that the paper be not received.

Mr. WEBSTER said he knew no difference in the application of the rule between the Chair and an individual member of the Senate. If the Chair could decline saying whether the paper was in such language as made it fit to be received or not, then any member of the Senate could also refuse.

Mr. WRIGHT said, if he understood the facts in relation to this paper, it had already been before the Senate, and they had refused to receive it. The paper had since been returned to the place from whence it came, and the objectionable part, he believed, had been stricken out; that part was not now here. The objection raised was to the preamble, which is not connected with the proceedings, and to certain mutilations of the paper, not now connected with it. If so, by presenting it in this manner, the Chair signified its duty to lay the paper before the Senate, the exceptionable parts being now out of the question.

Mr. CLAY replied, there was some perseverance in this matter beyond what met the eye. The objection was not solely to the mutilation. The paper was now brought back, with an expression on the part of those who sent it, that they did not feel authorized to alter the proceedings. In other words, that what had been done by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WILKINS,] in altering the paper, they do not feel authorized to do; and therefore they send it back, with the exception of the preamble. The rule that the preamble is not part of an enactment was not applicable to the proceedings of public meetings, and that being stricken out, the Chair deems it somewhat questionable as to propriety of language, and throws the responsibility of receiving it on the Senate. Now, he would vote against receiving it, because it was the duty of the Chair to state whether it was in respectful language or not. The Chair declined doing this, and he was not willing that the responsibility should rest on the Senate, the Chair having declined the preliminary question.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, did not know how far the gentleman from Kentucky intended his remark to go, when he insisted upon every individual who presented papers to the Senate, to vouch for the respectful language in which they were couched. Were they to vouch for every expression contained in them? Had the gentleman read these resolutions? There was nothing disrespectful in them. The preamble was every way exceptionable, but that has been stricken out, and now the resolutions come back in an unexceptionable form. In what terms, he would ask, are petitioners to clothe their meaning or their views? To what parts of these resolutions does the gentleman except. There was but one resolution which could be tortured to apply to any individual in either House of Congress—and that only says that the bank has used its funds to corrupt members of Congress, without designating any one. And had they not a right to say so, if they believed it? He hoped the resolutions would be read, in order that we may see whether there be any thing objectionable in them.

Mr. CLAYTON was opposed to receiving the resolutions, because the preamble which had been appended to them was a component part of the whole proceedings, and no one had a right to strike it out.

Mr. PRESTON said that a change of circumstances had made an essential difference in this case. The preamble was now off, and the paper sent back; the agents in this matter say they were not empowered to send the preamble, and therefore they have sent the resolutions; and they have decided that the preamble is not a part of the proceedings. He thought they were the proper persons to decide upon this question; whether they had done so improperly, was not for us to decide; but a liberal discretion ought to be allowed them. When the paper was sent to the Presiding Officer, he was bound to exercise a certain degree of discretion about presenting it. If he had doubts about its propriety; it was proper for him to submit it to the Senate, so that it might be read, and if in the course of reading, it were found exceptionable, any gentleman might move to dispense with any further reading, or to refuse to receive the paper. He hoped this might be read for that purpose.

Mr. POINDEXTER said that these proceedings had already been refused by the Senate. There was no power to strike out the preamble—it was as much a part of the proceedings as the resolutions. The same objections he urged to the proceedings before, exist now, and he did not think the letter from the committee cured the defect. There was another objection. Those gentlemen express their regret that they could not strike out the offensive resolution, but say they meant no offence to either House of Congress in the resolution. The resolutions did not speak the voice of York county, and if they had, they ought to have called another meeting, and if their proceedings had been respectful, we would have received them. One of these resolutions stated that the Bank of the United States had used its money to purchase support in this and the other House. It was precisely the same paper as the other, and he was decidedly opposed to reading it, and he thought it ought to be condemned by a vote of the Senate.

Some further remarks were made by Messrs. CALHOUN, LEIGH, EWING, and KANE; when,

On motion of Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, Mr. CLAY's motion, that the paper be not received, was laid on the table.

RE-CHARTERING BANK UNITED STATES.

The Senate then resumed the consideration of the question of granting Mr. WEBSTER leave to bring in a bill to re-charter the Bank of the United States.

Mr. WHITE took the floor, and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President: When a subject of so much importance is under consideration—when topics are discussed which produce a diversity of opinion, not only as to the powers conferred upon the Federal Government, but also, as to the manner in which the powers certainly conferred are distributed among the several departments; and when our decision may vitally affect, as well the fiscal concerns of the Government as the pecuniary interests of all classes of the community, I am unwilling to record my votes until I shall have given some of the reasons, at least, which lead to them. I am pleased that the honorable Senator from Massachusetts has asked leave to introduce this bill; not because I approve of it, but because it offers something practical, which we can discuss, consider, and decide. If the bill proposed contained any principle, which under any modification, I believed we had a power to enact into a law, I would most willingly extend the usual courtesy of granting leave to introduce it, although I might disapprove all its details; but, in my judgment, its object is to do that which, by the constitution we have no power to do. The sole object is, to extend the charter of the present Bank of the United States, under certain modifications, for the term of six years after the 3d of March, 1836, when the existing charter will expire. It is said the country is distressed in consequence of the derangement of our currency, and the object of this bill is to relieve that distress, by extending the charter. If leave is granted to introduce the bill, the hope will be indulged, that in due season the bill will be passed into a law, and the relief desired be thus afforded. We ought not, in my opinion, even by our silence, to encourage any expectation or hope which we do not intend to make good. Entertaining the opinions which I do, in relation to this bank, I cannot silently acquiesce in the introduction of this bill, without creating expectations which, so far as is in my power, I should certainly disappoint; therefore, I hope, when I deny the leave asked, my conduct may not be attributed to a willingness to act otherwise than courteously toward the honorable Senator who has submitted the motion. I hold that, by the constitution of the United States, Congress has no power to create a bank, and having no power to create it, we have no power to continue it beyond the period limited for its termination. I wish the Senate not to be alarmed, from a belief that I am about to weary their patience, or exhaust my own strength, by an elaborate argument to prove the truth of this position. I am well aware that this question has been repeatedly and ably discussed in Congress, and before our highest judicial tribunals, and that many of the most enlightened and pure men we have ever had in public employ, have affirmed the existence of this power; yet I consider the question unsettled. The power has always been questioned and disputed; it never has been yielded. The decisions are not binding as authorities, when Congress is called upon to exercise the power. If we are certain we do not possess it, or it is doubtful whether we do, it ought not to be exercised. Those who affirm the existence of this power, do not pretend that in the constitution it is expressly granted, but rely upon that clause of the 8th section, 1st article, which provides that "Congress shall have power to pass all laws necessary and proper to carry into effect the powers expressly granted." They next say that, by the 5th paragraph of the same section, Congress has an express grant of power "to coin money, and to fix the value thereof, and the value of foreign coin, and to regulate the standard of weights and measures." Hence, they argue that it was the intention to vest in Congress the whole power over the monetary system of the United States, and that this cannot be done without giving a power to incorporate a bank. I admit it was intended to vest the whole power in Congress, over our money, our currency, but deny that there is any necessity for a bank to give effect to this power. By the 10th section, 1st article, it is said, "No State shall coin money, emit bills of credit, make any thing but gold and silver a tender in payment of debts; pass any bill of attainder, ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligation of contracts." Before the formation of this constitution, much injury was supposed to have resulted from the power which the individual States possessed and exercised, of emitting bills of credit; therefore, this power is taken from the States, by express words. The Federal Government has no power but that which is expressly given, as is said, in the tenth amendment to the constitution. There is no power given, in any part of that instrument, to emit bills of credit. Since the adoption of this constitution, the power to emit bills of credit is extinct in the United States. The State Governments cannot exercise it, because it is expressly taken away; the Federal Government cannot exercise it, because it is not given to it; therefore this evil of a paper currency is effectually cured. Before the adoption of this constitution, the States had a power to make articles of produce, or merchandise, a tender in payment of debts. This power, in some of the States, had been exercised. It is also extinguished under the present constitution. Formerly, there was a want of uniformity in the value of the same piece of money, in the different States: in some, a dollar was four shillings and eight pence; in another, six shillings; in others, seven and six pence; and in some others, eight shillings. This was an evil cured by this constitution. Congress has the power to "coin money and fix its value, and the value of foreign coin;" and the power to coin money, in future, is denied to the States. Thus uniformity in value is produced: a dollar in one State, is a dollar, and no more, in every other. Weights and measures were, and might be varied in different States. The power to regulate the standard of weights and measures is given to Congress: when exercised, uniformity in each State is produced: a bushel of wheat must be of the same quantity, and a hundred pounds of hemp or tobacco must be of the same weight, in each State.

By these different provisions, the whole people of the United States were intended to be secured in a uniform currency, a uniform standard of weights and measures; and the same provisions contain a prohibition against making any thing but gold and silver a tender in payment of debts, and a denial of any power to pass a law to impair the obligation of contracts. What species of currency then, I ask, was intended? Metallic, and nothing else. Money coined and the value fixed, under the authority of Congress, or foreign coin, the value of which is fixed by the same power. Will any gentleman state, that in his opinion, either Congress or a State legislature, has a power, under our constitution, to make one individual receive from another any thing but a metallic currency, in discharge of a debt due? The opinion that Congress has no power to create a bank, is, as I think, very much strengthened, when we reflect where the convention sat, when it sat, and what was going on in relation to banks.

The Bank of North America commenced business in January, 1782, in Philadelphia. It had a double authority, as was supposed, for so doing—from Congress, and from the legislature of Pennsylvania. In 1785, it had become so odious, that several counties petitioned the legislature to repeal the charter. These petitions were referred to a committee, who made a report, upon which an act did pass, repealing the charter, without giving the corporators any form of trial whatever. This gave rise to a most violent controversy, in the course of which there were many publications. The bank still continued its business, under the power it had derived from Congress. In 1786, an attempt was made in the legislature to repeal the repealing act, but this attempt was successfully resisted by the democrats of that day, headed by Finley and Smilie, and the confusion continued till the next year, when a limited charter for fourteen years was granted. Thus we find, at the very time the convention sat, and in the very place it sat, the practical operations of the bank of that day were considered decidedly hostile to the liberty and independence of the country. Is it then probable that it was intended to vest a power in Congress to create any institution capable of so much mischief?

I have looked into the petitions presented to the legislature, and the report of the committee, to ascertain the objections upon which the repealing act was founded, and have been so forcibly struck with the similarity of the reasons then urged, with those since relied upon, that I must ask the indulgence of the Senate while I read the report, a copy of which is before me, in these words:—"That it is the opinion of this committee, that the said bank, as at present established, is in every view incompatible with the public safety—that in the present state of our trade, the said bank has a direct tendency to banish a great part of the specie from the country, so as to produce a scarcity of money, and to collect into the hands of the stockholders of the said bank, almost the whole of the money which remains amongst us. That the accumulation of enormous wealth, in the hands of a society who claim perpetual duration, will necessarily produce a degree of influence and power, which cannot be intrusted in the hands of any set of men whatsoever, without endangering the public safety. That the said bank, in its corporate capacity, is empowered to hold estates to the amount of ten millions of dollars, and by the tenor of the present charter, is to exist forever, without being obliged to yield any emolument to the Government, or to be at all dependent upon it. That the great profits of the bank, which will daily increase, as money grows scarcer, and which already far exceed the profits of European banks, have tempted foreigners to vest their money in this bank, and thus to draw from us large sums of interest.

"That foreigners will, doubtless, be more and more induced to become stockholders, until the time may arrive, when this enormous engine of power may become subject to foreign influence; this country may be agitated with the politics of European courts, and the good people of America reduced once more, to a state of subordination and dependance upon some one or other of the European powers. That at last, even if it were confined to the hands of Americans, it would be totally destructive of that equality which ought to prevail in a republic. We have nothing in our free and equal Government capable of balancing the influence the bank must create, and we see nothing which, in the course of a few years, can prevent the directors of the bank from governing Pennsylvania. Already we have felt its influence, directly interfering in the measures of the legislature. Already the House of Assembly, the representatives of the people, have been threatened, that the credit of our paper currency will be blasted by the bank; and if the growing evil continues, we fear the time is not very distant when the bank will be able to dictate to the legislature what laws to pass, and what to forbear."

Much has been said of the President's opinions upon the subject of banks and his ideas respecting the dangers to be apprehended from the operations of this bank. He appears to be maintaining the same doctrines maintained by the republican people of Pennsylvania in 1785, 1786, and 1787; and, as I verily believe, the same doctrine intended to be incorporated into the constitution, and made perpetual by it.

It seems to be thought by the honorable Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] that although we cannot establish a bank to make money, we may to have a currency; which will control the currency of State banks. I find no warrant in the constitution for any such distinction. [Here Mr. CALHOUN interrupted Mr. WHITE, and said, he had taken a distinction between doing and undoing.] Mr. W. continued, and said, I hope the honorable Senator will believe me when I say nothing is farther from my wish than to misrepresent his arguments. I can have no motive to do so. The distinction between doing and undoing can have no influence on my argument. This bill attempts to do something, not to undo. Its object is to continue this charter six years longer. This is an exertion of the same kind of power which was exerted in passing the charter for twenty years, in 1816. This power is not given by the constitution. The honorable Senator thinks the wise course is, to look at the circumstances in which we are placed, and adapt our measures to our situation. This is all true when we possess the power to act; but here the first consideration is, have we the power? If we have not, it is vain to consider how that ought to be used which we do not possess. The present charter has yet two years to run: if the object of this bill were now to repeal it, then the doctrine of the honorable Senator would be applicable. With him I would look to the circumstances in which we are placed, and although I might believe the act of 1816, incorporating the bank, to be unconstitutional, yet as the stockholders and society had acquired interests under the act, I would not offend the moral sense of the community by voting for the repeal; besides, I would reflect that these rights were subjects of judicial cognizance, and if a mistake were made here, as to our powers, the courts would protect the rights of individuals; but the object of this bill is not to repeal, it is to extend. It is not to take any thing from the bank, but to continue its powers six years longer, as the bill now is; twelve years, as the Senator from South Carolina thinks it ought to be. I deny the power to do this. The case of Louisiana, referred to by the honorable Senator from Virginia, [Mr. LEXON,] and which the Senator from South Carolina thinks so happy an illustration of his doctrine, with great deference, I must say, does not appear to me to have any application.

Mr. Jefferson, it is said, entertained an opinion that Louisiana could not, consistently with the constitution, be purchased and added to the Union. It was purchased, has been formed into a State, and admitted on an equal footing with the other States; and gentlemen ask, will you now exclude her because it was unconstitutional to admit her? I answer, no. I would look to the existing state of things, and take no step—let them remain as I found them. But suppose it had been possible to have admitted her upon trial for six years, to see how she would behave in the Union, and when those six years had elapsed, there was an application to admit her permanently; then we should have an analogous case, and, I say, the constitutional question would be as much open as it was when she was admitted for the six years. [Here Mr. LEXON interrupted Mr. WATTS, and said, he desired to know what would be done when Arkansas applied for admission, and he would, with as much pleasure, receive the information from the Senator from Tennessee, as from any other gentleman?] Mr. W. continued: In answer to the interrogatory put by the honorable Senator from Virginia, I can only say, that when Arkansas does apply to be admitted as a member State, if any gentleman shall think it unconstitutional to admit her, we will then examine and decide the question.

Mr. President, I can find no warrant in the constitution for a distinction between money and currency. That circulating medium which is to be the standard by which the seller and buyer of property are to ascertain its value, is metallic, to be coined and its value fixed by Congress; or foreign coin, the value of which is fixed by the same power. Nothing else is money, nothing else is currency, by the constitution. By the first clause of the 8th section of the 1st article of the constitution, a power is vested in Congress "to lay and collect taxes, imposts, duties, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States." It is argued by those who maintain the power to incorporate a bank, that it is necessary and proper to have one, as an agent to collect the taxes, to keep them safely, and to pay the debts due by the Government, in the different sections of the country. I think a Bank of the United States would be convenient for these purposes, but deny that one is necessary.

Mr. President, if there were no bank, either State or Federal, in the Union, our taxes could be collected, the money safely kept and paid out, according to the provisions of law, by the appointment of natural persons. Now we may employ them in preference to banks, if we choose. There cannot, therefore, be a necessity to create a bank for such purpose; and if we infer the power to make the bank, because it would be a matter of convenience, where can any limit be fixed to implied powers? I cannot fix any. But suppose a bank to be necessary and proper as a fiscal agent—there are State banks—why not employ them? It is said that, as these banks are not created by Congress, we cannot have any control over them. This I deny: we will have all the control over them which we ought to have. The custom of the United States, as depositors, will always be sufficient to ensure fidelity in the collection, safe-keeping, and disbursement of your money; and these are the only uses we have for such agents. Whenever it is believed one is about to act in bad faith, dismiss it. This we will always have a power to do; and a fear that this power will be exercised, will procure fidelity. Your power will always be sufficient for every salutary purpose: seldom, if ever, sufficient to be productive of mischief. Suppose a bank employed in each State, over which we have no control, except what our deposits would give: there would then be twenty-four banks, governed by directors, created under the authority of the respective States, accountable to them, and each independent of every other. How could the United States procure a concert of action among them for any unworthy purpose? Corrupting one would be no advance in attaining the object. All must be corrupted the moment the attempt was made—and one honest man found in any one board, the whole plan would be exposed, and its authors held up to public contempt and scorn. A bank, created by the United States, accountable to them, having the use of all your money, and managed by a majority of a board, composed of seven men, is in a very different situation. The pecuniary influence you would have, would be much greater—the number of men necessary to corrupt would be so small, that the danger of improper influence is increased to an alarming extent. But it is said the very admission that Congress may employ State banks as fiscal agents, is an admission of the power to create a bank for the same purpose. This, I think, is not so. You wish an artificial person to perform a particular service for you—you find artificial persons already made that can perform these services—there cannot therefore be any necessity that you should create one, simply that you may employ him in preference. What is the real difficulty and struggle here? It is not that we create a bank to have a fiscal agent. No. The real struggle is to keep in existence a commercial bank for commercial purposes. It is dismissed by the Executive from its fiscal agency, and yet it continues endowed with powers sufficient to embarrass all commercial transactions.

The truth is, that upon a supposed necessity for a bank as a fiscal agent, one was created in 1816, endowed with powers for the most extensive commercial uses; and instead of the duties of a fiscal agent being its aim or principal business, its leading, its general, its profitable, and almost constant employ, is unconnected with this agency, and its business is devoted, almost exclusively, to other purposes. The business of a fiscal agent dwindles into a mere by-business, entirely incidental, so much so, that when these duties are taken from it, we find it possessed of powers and capacities almost without limit, for good or for evil, so far as the moneyed affairs of the country are concerned. This, I conceive, is a practice under the constitution, unsupported by a fair construction of it. I think, with the honorable Senator from South Carolina, that these powers are trust powers, and ought to be so exerted as to attain the object in vesting the trust. Now, if it be true that we have a constitutional power to create a bank, for the purpose of collecting the public money, keeping it safe, and paying it out, at the points desired, it gives no power to create a bank for the purpose of issuing bank notes, and granting accommodations to those concerned in trade and commerce, to any extent the wants or wishes of society may require.

Again. If it is necessary and proper to incorporate a bank as a fiscal agent, which I do not admit, there can be no power to establish such a bank as this. We can neither wish nor expect a bank of issues and of circulation; all we can possibly need will be a bank of discount and deposit, and that of a small capital. Such a bank would be perfectly able to make our collections, preserve, and pay out the public moneys; and, in addition to the discharge of these duties, such a bank could and would most effectually check excessive issues of paper by the State banks; it could also grant discounts to a reasonable extent, to commercial men or others; and likewise by drafts on the different branches, in different sections of country, could furnish the means of remittance to any extent that would be reasonably required. Indeed, one on a scale still more limited would answer every fiscal purpose. A bank of deposit and transfer is all that the Government could have occasion for. How, then, is it possible we can fairly deduce a power to establish a bank, and vest in the corporation the immense powers which this charter confers, I am unable to discover; therefore, I will not consent to use a power which I do not think we possess, to prolong the existence of such an institution for a day, a year, or for any other term whatever. Holding these opinions, I am not among the number of those who can ever be embarrassed by the question, whether the United States Bank ought to be placed in Chestnut street or in Wall street.

Mr. President, if we had the power to create a bank, I insist it is bad policy to exercise it as is now proposed. The objections to extending the charter are, in my opinion, stronger than they were to incorporating the bank originally. The theory of our Government is perfect equality. Make all safe in every thing to which they have a just right, and give no one an advantage, by law, over any other. This we ought, as far as we can, to carry out in practice. When the act of incorporation was passed, there was an apparent equality at least, because every citizen had an equal opportunity of subscribing for stock; but if we extend the charter, the value of the stock is immediately increased, and the present stockholders have, by law, a privilege extended to them, in exclusion of every other person. But, sir, if I am mistaken in every thing I have said, I still contend the charter ought not to be prolonged. The immediate benefit to be derived from the passage of this bill, is relief to a distressed community. To form a proper estimate of the remedy, we ought to have some opinion of the extent of the disease, and of the causes which have produced it.

I am not among the number of those who deny that there is any pecuniary distress. That there is, in many parts of the country, a want of money, and considerable sacrifices because it cannot be obtained, I verily believe. These sufferings have not yet reached the particular country which I in part represent; but, as all others, as well as my immediate constituents, are to be affected by my votes, I consider it as much my duty to relieve the distresses of others, if in my power, as it would be to relieve the distresses of those I immediately represent. I will add, that there does not live in the United States the human being, whose condition I would not gladly make better. What has led to these pecuniary wants, is a question on which there has been some variety of opinion. I think it very obvious, that the operations of the Bank of the United States have been the principal cause. She has not only refrained from granting the usual accommodations to men in business, but she has been operating the wrong way; she has been curtailing her discounts; this has compelled State banks to do so likewise. Money then is made much scarcer than formerly. The demand for it is increased. Under the tariff laws, cash is now to be paid in some instances where credit had formerly been given. In other cases, where long credits had been given, short credits are now allowed. The long credits and the short credits have been falling due at the same time. The bank has caused bills to be purchased, payable in the large cities, to a greater amount than formerly. These different causes have created an increased demand for money, and the common means of obtaining it are withdrawn. To these, ought to be added the doubt and uncertainty, as to the result of our legislation, which prevents men of business from adapting their proceedings to any settled course.

The result of the whole is, the business part of the community need more money than formerly, and can obtain less. I believe there is suffering and distress, and if this bank is to wind up, this suffering must, at some period, be increased. If we admit, which I think we ought not, that the withdrawal of the deposits made some curtailment of her business necessary, on the part of the bank, I do not believe we ought to doubt but they have been carried farther than was necessary. One thing, I think, has been clearly shown by the honorable Senator from Missouri, that is, that no additional curtailments to make the bank safe can be necessary.

This bank, then, is the main cause of this suffering and this distress, and to relieve them we are asked to extend its powers for six years longer. Heretofore, it has pursued its own interest; will it not do so again? If its interest prompts to liberal accommodations, they will be granted, and the circulating medium will be plenty. If its objects can be better accomplished by withdrawing accommodations and lessening the circulating medium, that course will be pursued, and our pecuniary sufferings and distresses will again return. I have no confidence in such a remedy; it will probably be worse than the present disease.

How would the bank employ its vast means during the prolonged time? I think just in such manner as would most promote its own interest, without any special regard to the interest of the community. All persons, natural or artificial, dread dissolution. The natural person will cling to existence as long as possible; he will lay hold of any thing within his reach, by which he can preserve himself for an hour, a day, or a week: just so with this corporation; it will use its whole power to procure a renewal of the charter, after the lapse of the six years. It will use its means to increase the number of its friends, and to put its opponents in a situation not to thwart its views. It will extend its business whenever and wherever such a course will aid its prospects; it will contract its issues and curtail its discounts whenever and wherever opposition to its plans can be put down by oppression. I have no idea that the directors now, or at any other time, have engaged in any scheme of oppression, because they delight in inflicting an injury upon any one. Corporations, it is said, have no souls, but they are managed by those who have, and by those who will be attentive to their own interests, and will use their powers to promote them. Prolong this charter, and your control is gone; the bank will act as it may think best; it will and must mingle in your politics; its permanency will depend on displacing enemies from power, and supplying their places by the promotion of friends. No means will be left untried to accomplish this object. That it should interfere in politics, is inherent in the charter itself. It is a partnership between the Government and individuals. It is a mixture of political power with money, and in every controversy in which the corporation can have an interest, the bank will interfere in elections on the one side or the other. The principles contained in the charter lead necessarily to this result, and we need to expect nothing else. The very object of extending for six years is, to relieve the community presently; and, in the mean time, to see whether this bank shall be continued afterwards, or some other substituted. How, then, can we doubt its course during this period? It will extend its business first, and contract it afterwards, if success is likely to be attained by such a course.

If its business is ever to cease, why not at the end of the present charter? It is admitted the resources of the country never were greater than now. There is no reason to believe debtors will ever be more able to pay. We have had distress and suffering for five or six months; if the charter is prolonged, this must be gone over again six years hence, and there is no reason to think we shall be better able to meet the demands of the bank then than now. The remedy for the present distress is only a palliative; the cause of the disease will remain in the system; it will be acquiring strength for six years, and then break out with increased violence, and the injury and ruin will be on a more extensive scale. We can only form an opinion of what the bank will do in future, by reflecting on what it has done in times past.

In December, 1829, the Chief Magistrate made his first communication to Congress, showing that he was disinclined to a renewal of the charter. This was followed up in his messages of 1830 and 1831. These communications he was bound in duty to make, if he believed the public good would be promoted by an expression of his opinions to the national legislature. The bank, ever attentive to its own interest, in 1831, began a rapid extension of its business, and early in 1832, had increased its accommodations to the amount of twenty-eight millions of dollars, as its opponents say, and as is admitted by itself, to upwards of seventeen millions. The Presidential election took place in the fall of 1832. To me it appears plain, this extension was intended to make as many friends as acts of kindness could make. The accommodations are now reduced from seventy millions to about fifty-four millions. Why this decrease? The expansion or contraction must have been too great. The pretence is, that the state of the country required the increase, when there was an extension, and that accommodations were curtailed when the state of business justified the reduction. We all know that there is an error in this statement. There was no such change in the business of the country, as to justify this change in the policy of the bank. Friends were to be made, by extending wide the wings of the net, with a full knowledge that when the birds were coaxed in and those wings contracted, the fluttering would commence, and an escape from the toils would be sought by almost any means. The increase and decrease were made with a view to the interest of the stockholders, without regard to the effect upon the customers, or upon society.

The bank went into operation the first day of January, 1817. One of the leading objects in granting its charter was, through its operations, to reduce the extravagant dealings with State banks; to restore and preserve a sound currency to the country. The directors well knew this, yet they acted with a single eye to what they conceived the interest of the bank, and its friends, in place of checking, it stimulated overtrading. Instead of restoring and preserving a sound currency, it adopted measures which, in 1818 and 1819, placed it in the power of the State banks in Philadelphia to take from it every single dollar, and leave it still in debt to them upwards of one hundred and twenty-four thousand dollars. Mr. Cheves took charge of the bank, and, as president, pursued a policy which, in seventy days, placed the bank in a state of security; but the curtailments were so rapid, and the withdrawal of the circulating medium so great, as to ruin society, compel other banks to suspend specie payments, and again afflict the community with a depreciated currency. Liberal accommodations and extensive issues had given an appearance of wealth to those worth little or nothing. Property commanded enormous prices, as this bank had made money plenty; but the counter current commenced, and, in 1819, a scene of wide-spread ruin was presented. The bank made money scarce; the price of property fell to almost nothing; those who had been apparently wealthy, were found to be bankrupts, and hardly any man had wherewithal to pay his debts. An individual had, when money was plenty, purchased a house and lot for ten thousand dollars; he paid six thousand, was sued for the balance; the house and lot was sold at fifteen hundred dollars, and thus, he sunk in the single bargain, eight thousand five hundred dollars. In the principal cities and towns, thousands of individuals were thrown out of employ; the whole business of the country was deranged, scenes of misery and distress were produced, to which the present distress and pressure bear but little resemblance. This state of things was produced because the directors managed the bank with a view to their own interest, and that of their friends, disregarding the interest of that community from which they had acquired their power. May they not do so again? Have we not reason to fear they will, if the charter is prolonged?

[Here Mr. WHITE gave way for a motion to adjourn. On the following day, he resumed and concluded his remarks, as follows:]

Mr. President: Before I resume the discussion in which I was yesterday engaged, when the Senate adjourned, I must beg permission to call the attention of this body, for the first time since I have been honored with a seat here, to a newspaper paragraph, in which my name has been introduced. I know that my standing here is too humble, and my opinions of too little value, to make it necessary for me, on common occasions, to contradict any statement coupled with my name; but, considering the excitement which now prevails in some sections of the country, and the desire repeatedly expressed, for the adoption of some measure, by Congress, to relieve the community from the distresses which it is said they experienced, I think it improper to permit any statement to remain uncontradicted which is calculated to excite expectations which, so far as in my power, will not be fully realized.

The publication to which I allude, purports to be a correspondence with the New York Journal of Commerce, and is in the following words:

“WASHINGTON, March 19, 1834.

“At length we may discern one faint glimmer of light in our political prospect. Mr. Calhoun has devised a plan for a new national bank on principles which wholly avoid the constitutional scruples of the Southern representatives, and which will be generally acceptable. The plan has been submitted to a number of Senators of different parties, and has been decidedly approved, particularly by those Senators who are opposed, on constitutional grounds, to the re-charter of the present bank, and who are at the same time averse to General Jackson's experiment upon the currency. It is also unequivocally approved, it is said, by Messrs. Grundy and White, who are friendly to the President.”

Mr. President, what I have now to say in relation to the matters mentioned in this letter, is, that I have no knowledge of any plan for a bank to be submitted by the honorable Senator from South Carolina; that I know nothing of that gentleman's opinions on the subject of a United States Bank except what I have collected from the public speeches delivered here. The last of those speeches was not delivered until after the date of this letter. Out of his place in this chamber, I have not heard from him one word during this session, on the subject of any bank whatever. Therefore, the whole statement in this letter, so far as my name is connected with it, is erroneous, and has not the shadow of truth for its foundation. I have shown this letter to my colleague, whose name is also mentioned; he has read it, and I am not only authorized, but requested, by him to say, that the same statement which I made as to myself, is equally true as it relates to him.

When the Senate adjourned on yesterday, I was considering the effects on society, in the year 1819, of the proceedings of the Bank of the United States, from the time it went into operation. The distresses then experienced, and those now felt, are the fruits of the charter granted in 1816. The patriots of that day found the country flooded with a depreciated paper medium, put in circulation by State banks, and unfortunately, as I think, sought to remedy the evil by the establishment of a bank. As the United States were to have the entire moneyed power by the constitution, and as the States had established banks, it was believed the United States might establish one also, to regulate the currency. Instead of this, if the collection of the revenue, and all debts due to the Government, had been enforced in money, the moral sense of the community, the fertility of soil, and the industry of the people, would soon have given us a sound circulating medium. State banks which had the means, would soon have been compelled to resume and continue specie payments, and those which were unable to do so, must have stopped business. The duties upon foreign importations alone were from forty to fifty millions of dollars. With the power of the Government exerted in a proper direction, a sound currency must have been procured, within a very short period. But bank notes, though not money, were considered currency, and, with a view to check and control a depreciated State currency, it was supposed the United States had a power to establish a bank which should give a sound currency itself, and compel State banks to do so likewise. This word "currency" I cannot find in the constitution. Constitutionally speaking, nothing but money is currency, and nothing can be money which is not metallic. Bank notes, issued under the authority of the Federal or State Governments, are not currency; they are not money, nor can they be made so. They are nothing but credits, used by common consent, to pass as substitutes for money. Promissory notes, negotiable and negotiated, or bills of exchange, are as much entitled to the appellation of currency, as bank notes are. If bank notes are currency, what will be said of the notes of the bank of the late Stephen Girard? What of the notes of the bank of my countrymen, Yeatman, Woods, and Co? These bank notes are as current as the notes of the Bank of the United States. A man may set out at New Orleans, and travel on to Philadelphia, and he will find these notes current the whole route; yet no charter for a bank was ever granted by any Government to either of those gentlemen. These notes are nothing but credits; they pass in place of money by common consent, and so do the other bank notes. The only thing that gives them currency is the confidence that, whenever the holder wishes money for them, and will apply for it at the place specified for payment, the makers will be found able and willing to pay the specie, and lift them. Nothing can prevent them from depreciation but this confidence.

Mr. President, I know of whom I speak; and I know among them are men who have the highest claims to our confidence which purity of motive and strength of intellect can give; yet I must be permitted to say, I think the distinction then taken and acted on, by granting this charter, between money and currency, has no warrant in the constitution. I think the bank then created in consequence of that distinction, an excrescence which has grown out of an erroneous construction. This bank is a political cancer, the roots and fibres of which have ramified themselves through all society; and we might as well hope to tear from the human body the cancer there formed, as to expect to remove from the body politic this bank, without causing pain and suffering.

It is due, I think, to this subject, that we should permit our minds to recur to the situation in which we were placed as to our currency, when this act of incorporation was passed, and the causes which led to the state of things which then existed. War had been declared in 1812, without any pecuniary preparation to meet the extraordinary calls which the prosecuting of the war could not fail to produce. So far from this, the conduct of some of the European powers had driven our Government into a series of restrictive measures, which so much embarrassed our commercial operations as to produce distresses and complaints, which were poured into Congress in the strongest terms. Out of Congress, these measures were reprobated in terms of great bitterness. The measures of the then administration were represented as ruinous to the commerce of the country; it was said we were truckling to a foreign power; that there was no mode of maintaining the honor of the country but by a declaration of war, and that the administration was so pusillanimous it could not be kicked into a war.

Congress believed there was just cause, and therefore did declare war against Great Britain. Money was necessary; the Treasury had it not; it must be procured by loans; the opponents of the administration employed themselves assiduously, no doubt many of them from very proper motives, to produce an indisposition in all who had money, to grant those loans. The politicians, the presses, even the pulpits, endeavored to impress the public with the opinion that it was immoral and wicked to furnish funds to prosecute a war so unjust, and which had been declared, as they insisted, from motives most unworthy. This course of the opposition stimulated the advocates of the administration to exert every nerve to procure the necessary funds. Individuals and banks made loans to the full extent of all their means. The banks were soon led to believe that it was a test of patriotism to be liberal in their advances. They were urged, nay almost begged, by the administration, to take up loans. The consequence was, that the banks extended their loans to Government and to individuals, beyond the limits which their specie would justify. Let it never be forgotten, that without the paper of these banks, a barrel of flour, a load of ammunition, or even a flint, could not be purchased for your army or navy. Peace was restored in 1815; it found some of the banks already not paying specie; many others soon afterwards suspended such payments also. This, so far from being discountenanced by the Government, was most certainly winked at, if not expressly approved.

A depreciation in the value of the notes of these banks was the necessary consequence of suspending specie payments; and the same political party which declared the war, still constituted the majority, and endeavored to devise some plan to restore a sound currency to the country. The plan devised was the instrumentality of this bank. The object was not gain to the stockholders, but the high purpose of regulating the currency, through the power of this agent. The Government had five directors, and the stockholders twenty, and at the head of the directory was placed a man of high respectability—one of so much character, that if I mistake not, at one period during the war, he acted as the head of three of the Executive Departments at the same time.

The bank commenced its operations, and instead of aiming, by a prudent, steady, and wise policy, to attain the object for which it was created, it united with the State banks in extending accommodations to individuals, and increasing the issues of bank paper to a most unreasonable extent. Specie payments were resumed, it is true. Branches of this bank were established in several of the States: those established in the West, with which I had the only acquaintance, were not furnished with one dollar of actual capital. The cashier was sent to establish a branch, furnished with drafts for the public moneys deposited in the State banks, and with a power to collect the floating capital in the country, by drawing upon the banks in the Eastern cities. In place, then, of aiding State banks to continue specie payments, when resumed, this very bank withdrew the means of enabling them to do so. In place of inducing them to curtail, by prudent means, their issues, already too great, they were encouraged to increase their circulation still more. The immense amount of money in circulation gave an artificial value to every thing. Overtrading was carried to such an extent, that all idea of the true standing and credit of men, in society, was lost sight of. Cities were improved, and villages sprung up, as if by enchantment: each little town was furnished with more merchants than were sufficient to have done the business of the whole country in which it was situated. This artificial state of things could not last. As soon as there was a demand for specie, the counter-current commenced. The United States Bank began a rapid curtailment, to save itself from open bankruptcy; it broke up State banks and individual customers. The State banks broke up their customers; many of them were forced to suspend again specie payments, and a depreciated currency was imposed upon the community. Some of the State banks never afterwards resumed specie payments; and a sound currency was not again restored to the country until from 1824 to 1826. When, in 1817 and 1818, there appeared nothing but wealth, prosperity, and comfort, in 1819, 1820, and for some time after, there was one scene of pressure, distress, bankruptcy, and ruin. And all this grew out of the incorporation of this bank, and transferring to it the power of regulating the currency. The country was flooded with a paper currency when it suited the bank to make property high; and the whole circulating medium was withdrawn, when it was the interest of the bank to reduce property in value. What assurance can we have that the operations of this bank will not again be directed to individual gain, should the charter be prolonged?

This bank was vested with its extensive powers for high governmental purposes. It is admitted that the State banks, generally, are completely in its power, and under its control. All these immense powers have been, in some instances, used for the purposes of individual gain, at the expense of the community. Society at large is unsafe while it is in the power of a board of directors of this bank to fix what value they please upon property, by making the common standard of value, the circulating medium, plenty or scarce.

Mr. President: The conduct of this bank well justified the Secretary of the Treasury in using the power given him by the 16th section of the act of incorporation, if he thought it sound policy to withdraw the public deposits. I will not weary the Senate by travelling over the whole of the reasons he has assigned for the removal, but advert briefly to some which, to my mind, would be satisfactory. The bank, as the fiscal agent, violated the trust reposed in it, by not paying the three per cent. stock as directed.

A summary of the leading facts show this case: The administration determined to pay a portion of this stock, at a given time. The bank was furnished with the necessary funds, and instructed to make the payment. Instead of complying with these instructions, it negotiated with the owners of the stock, to induce them not to apply for payment at the time specified, but to delay the application for some eight or twelve months, and promised that it, the bank, would pay the accruing interest. I contend this was a violation of duty, for which the agent should have been dismissed. An individual owes another a sum of money, bearing interest; he determines to pay the debt, and lift the bond: he furnishes his agent with the necessary funds, and instructs him to make the payment at a given period. The agent disobeys his instructions, and promises the creditor that if he will hold the bond twelve months longer, he will pay the interest. What ought the principal to do in such case? I say, dismiss the agent. And it should have been done in this case, with the less hesitation, because here the agent sought its own interest, at the time the instructions were violated. The uses to which the bank applied the money, yielded a profit of six per cent.; and the stock bore an interest of only three, so that the bank would pocket the difference.

Again: As I have already stated, this bank was established for the high purposes of restoring a sound currency to the community, and keeping it sound. The Secretary tells us in his report, that it commenced rapid curtailments in the month of August, and continued them up to the first of October; that these curtailments compelled the State banks to curtail likewise; that the deposits of public moneys enabled it to accumulate large balances against the State banks, and for those balances it was drawing the specie; that a continuance of this system a short time longer, would have compelled the State banks to have suspended specie payments, and visited the trading part of the community with bankruptcy and ruin. This state of facts, the truth of which I see no reason to doubt, furnished two satisfactory causes for changing the deposits.

1st. One object of vesting this corporation with these extravagant powers, in trust, was about to be violated. These powers were exerted in such a manner as to compel a suspension of specie payments, which would inevitably have led to a depreciated currency. This was a breach of the trust, and the Secretary had a right to ward off the mischief, by withdrawing the public funds, which were the instruments employed by the bank for the accomplishment of its purpose. Upon principle, it seems to me the Secretary had a right to exercise his power to maintain a sound currency, and it has been abundantly shown, that Mr. Crawford, when Secretary, often exerted the like power to accomplish the same object. But it has been argued that Mr. Crawford did not claim this power by virtue of this 16th section, but by virtue of the joint resolution adopted during the same session. To this argument by our opponents, I submit two answers. 1st. It is a mistake to suppose that Mr. Crawford did not claim this power in virtue of the 16th section. Some of his letters referred to by other gentlemen, show expressly, as I think, that this power was claimed and exercised in virtue of this very section. 2. If I am mistaken in this, and the power was exercised in virtue of the resolution, the same power is still continued to the present Secretary. The resolution is not temporary, but permanent. It is unlimited as to time. It authorizes the Secretary to adopt such measures as he may judge necessary to procure a sound currency. Of what use would it be to enable banks to resume specie payments, and afford a sound currency, unless such payments are continued. The same means, therefore, which could lawfully be employed to procure a sound currency, may be lawfully used to continue such a currency. If, then, Mr. Crawford could rightfully transfer the public moneys to State banks, to enable them to establish a sound currency, so could Mr. Taney to enable them to maintain it.

Again. If I am mistaken in this, from the same facts another reason is furnished, which justifies the removal. It is admitted by those who put the most limited construction upon the powers of the Secretary, that he may, and ought, to remove the public moneys whenever they are unsafe. They say the power of removal is a trust, and to be so used as to preserve the fund. Supposing this principle to be correct, for the sake of the argument. The Secretary informs us, that the bank was pursuing a course in the commercial cities, which, if not checked, would have compelled the State banks to suspend specie payments, and have placed in a state of bankruptcy the commercial community in those cities. These same merchants were the debtors of the Government upon bonds for duties constantly falling due: these bonds, when taken, are always deposited with the bank for collection; the Government has the same interest in its debtor continuing able to pay a bond thus deposited, that it has in preserving the money from loss, after it has been paid. Upon the principles assumed then, by honorable gentlemen who have argued on the other side, it seems to me the Secretary might well remove the deposits, if, by doing so, it would protect the debtors of the Government from that oppression practised by the bank, which would have ended in their bankruptcy, and have defeated the payment of the bonds already in possession of the bank for collection.

I contend, also, that the bank violated the spirit of the 9th fundamental rule contained in the 11th section of its charter, which is in these words: "The said corporation shall not directly or indirectly, deal or trade in any thing, except bills of exchange, gold or silver bullion, or in the sale of goods really and truly pledged for money lent, and not redeemed in due time," &c.

The bank is charged with having interfered in elections, and with having used its corporate funds, for the sake of defraying the expenses of publications intended to influence public opinion. The bank admits it has expended various sums to protect itself against unfounded accusations, and to enlighten public opinion as to the nature and operations of the bank. By looking into the bank statements it will be found, that before the present Chief Magistrate came into office, the expense account for printing was only a few hundred dollars per annum. In the two years 1831 and 1832, the expense account for "speeches in Congress, and other miscellaneous publications," was upward of $41,000. In the last of those years was the Presidential election. There can be no mistake as to facts; in this case they are shown, and openly admitted by the bank. The justification it sets up is, that it was attacked by the President, and it had a right to defend itself. The resolutions of the board show, that the directors authorized the president of the bank to expend money without limitation, for such purpose. Now I am willing to admit that a corporation may defend itself, by publishing a contradiction, or giving an explanation of any charge made against it by any person whatever; but there I say it must stop. It has no right, by any expenditure of its corporate funds, to enlighten, or regulate public opinion, on the science of banking.

How does the bank say the President attacked it? In his different messages to Congress. These communications it was his duty to make, if they contained his sentiments, and he believed it for the public interest that these opinions should be made known to the national legislature; and against such communications, the corporation had no right to make publications, or cause them to be made by others. If the bank is useful to the public, if its operations are beneficial to the community, that community and its public agents will advocate its utility. The individuals composing the corporation have the rights, and are allowed the same powers, through the press, or by other means, to defend their interests, that other individuals have, but they have not the additional right, to use their corporate funds for the same purposes. This would give the corporation such an advantage over individuals, as to bear them down, by the mere force of money. The corporation has no right to use a dollar for any purpose not specified in the charter, or necessary to give effect to some purpose specified. The matters, in which the corporation may trade, or deal, are specified. All others are forbidden. It has no right to deal in "speeches," in "addresses" to State legislatures, or in "miscellaneous publications." If it has a right to expend money in purchasing them, it has a right to make money by selling them. Why not set up a bookstore? The principle is the same. Nay, worse. The real object is, to trade in public opinion. Not to buy "golden opinions," but to procure opinions by the use of gold.

Honorable Senators who argue on the other side, say the bank can have no influence in elections, that there is a prejudice against moneyed institutions, and that, in a canvass, they would rather have the bank against than for them. I think very differently. A bank can, and often has a controlling influence, and the more dangerous, because it is often unseen; and if ever I should be engaged in a contest for popular favor, I would feel much more safe with the friendship than with the enmity of the bank.

The honorable Senator from Georgia, who has so ably and so eloquently sustained the course of the administration, thinks the bank can never influence public opinion, and adduces the result of the last Presidential election, as a proof of the correctness of this opinion. Mr. President, I admit the bank did interfere in the last election for President; that it spared no pains or expense to influence the public opinion against the present Chief Magistrate, and I admit he was elected by an overwhelming majority; but I deny that this was any proof that the bank has no influence, on ordinary occasions, where men of common standing and ordinary services, are competitors. The popularity of the successful candidate, is not of the ordinary kind—it does not rest on the common foundation. His public services commenced when he was yet a boy. At the close of the revolution, he was an orphan, without relatives, but not unknown or without friends. His services and his conduct had attracted the attention of some. With his manhood commenced a series of public services and employments, which have been continued throughout a long life, and one for usefulness having hardly any parallel. From these services, the roots of his popularity struck deep, and extended far among the people of the United States. They were watered by the sweat of many toils; they were strengthened by numerous and imminent perils, until finally, on the plains of New Orleans, he was presented in an aspect, and his character proclaimed to the world in peals of thunder, accompanied by blazes of lightning, that at the same time astonished, and drew tears of joy from the eyes of patriots within these walls. These services imbedded him in the hearts of his countrymen, and enthroned him in their affections. They fixed the conviction in public opinion, that he possessed a strength of mind, which the eloquence of Demosthenes cannot mislead; an integrity, which the wealth of Croesus cannot corrupt, and a firmness, which the daring boldness of Catiline cannot intimidate. Tell me not, then, that the result of this election is a proof that the bank can have no influence. In this instance, all ages and sexes knew and appreciated the services of the successful candidate. You can hardly find a boy twelve years of age, who cannot tell you something of them. But let a canvass commence, in which the bank feels an interest; let the competitors be men whose character and worth are only known to the few public men with whom they may have been associated, and we may witness a very different result.

Honorable Senators cannot perceive how the bank, through the use of money, can influence public measures. Mr. President, "money is the root of all evil." Men desire it, because it stands in place of every thing else. With it we can decorate our own persons, and gratify the wishes of our families. With it, we can, as we think, procure almost every temporal comfort. While we are men, it is in vain to talk of us as though we were angels. I can imagine many cases in which the use of money might have a decided influence on the conduct of men esteemed virtuous and enlightened. I have no fear of the influence of this bank, because it will go, or send others, to buy votes among the mass of the people, by giving five dollars to one, ten dollars to another, or twenty to a third. No, sir, my apprehensions from its influence are of a different description. Two years ago, this bank applied for a renewal of its charter; you [Mr. KING, of Alabama, in the Chair] and I, both opposed it. We voted against it, and used our best exertions to defeat it. It now seeks a restoration of the deposits, and an extension of its charter. We came here determined to vote against it, upon all points, and such we believe to be the sentiments and wishes of those we represent. Shortly after our arrival, you are informed that your crop of cotton has fallen far short of what you expected, and that its price is much lower than you anticipated. You had contracted a debt, say for ten thousand dollars, which you had directed your manager to pay from the proceeds of this crop. He informs you the crop has failed; that your creditor needs, and must have his money." (I beg your pardon for using your name for my illustration—take my own.) Here I am, without any more means than will bear current expenses, and here I must stay, until the business of the public is finished. What is to be done? I must borrow if I can, but from whom? Local banks have extended as far as they dare go; I need not apply to them. The United States Bank has means, and could accommodate, but I think it will not; it knows I have done and will continue to do, all I can to disappoint its wishes. I make my case known to my friends; they advise me to apply to this bank; that it does not proceed upon the selfish and illiberal principles attributed to it. I prepare my note, my friends endorse it, and I make my application. The officers tell me they can spare the money very conveniently; that they know the debt would be good, but if the loan was made, it might not in the end be an accommodation; that the bank is struggling for its existence, against all the influence the Executive can bring to bear; already has the public deposits been removed—there is no certainty they will be restored, and if they are, unless the charter is prolonged, they must be arranging their concerns for its termination; therefore, if they make the loan, they can give no assurance how long they can continue the accommodation; that they know I have been opposed to the bank, upon principle, and expect me to continue so, but that circumstance can make no difference; that it would give them as much pleasure to accommodate me, as if I were a friend to the institution, provided they could do so. My credit is in jeopardy—I need, and must have the money; I determine to take it, and run the risk of being in some way enabled to repay it when called upon. With the money I return with a light heart to my lodgings, and enclose it to my correspondent at home, with instructions to lift my bond. My mind dwells upon the transaction, and I begin to conclude after all this bank is not so bad as it has been represented—its conduct has, at all events, been more liberal to me than I had any reason to expect. I come into the Senate the next day, and listen attentively to the arguments adduced to prove that the President, in removing these deposits, has violated the public faith; that he has violated the chartered rights of this corporation; that he has usurped a power not vested in him by the constitution or laws, and that if such conduct receives no rebuke, the Government will be changed, and all power concentrated in the hands of one man, who will be a tyrant or a despot. These arguments make a deep impression; I reflect upon them; they acquire additional force, and I am sure they would have been satisfactory to my constituents, if they could have heard them; more especially as the question of "bank or no bank" is not involved. The question is, "constitution or no constitution," "liberty or slavery." My mind settles down in favor of restoring the deposits; I so vote, and the deposits are restored. What next? The State banks have extended their loans, on the strength of these deposits, which are now to be withdrawn. These accommodations must be rapidly curtailed; these curtailments produce bankruptcies and unmeasured distress in society; the funds necessary to protect these banks against the Bank of the United States, are taken from them, and placed in the hands of an enraged rival; through these funds large balances are immediately accumulated against them; the specie is all withdrawn from some one, and it is compelled to suspend specie payments; this creates a "panic," which produces a run upon all, and ends in a general suspension of specie payments. Here is a new state of things; a depreciated local currency. If we have bank notes at all, they ought to be of that description that five dollars here will be five dollars every where in the Union—neither I nor my constituents will be content to handle as money, rags and trash, for a pocket full of which a man could not pay for his breakfast. Up comes the great question for renewing and elongating the charter of this bank—"bank or no bank," and what am I now to do? This is precisely similar to the state of things which existed in 1816. As a statesman, I must adapt my legislation to the circumstances in which I find my country. In the like circumstances men of the strongest intellect, most cultivated minds, purest patriotism, and unsullied characters, gave up their constitutional scruples, and for the sake of purifying the "currency," established this bank; for the like reasons I will lay down my old opinions, and vote to continue it. The session closes, and before I go home, I call at the bank to make some arrangement relative to my loan, until I can return at the next session, and pay the debt. The officers tell me things have taken a direction which they did not anticipate; fortunately public agents have seen the public interest in its true light—the bank has had its charter enlarged, its business will be continued, and must of necessity require the services of some professional man as their legal adviser and attorney—that it will be considered a favor if I will accept my note as a retaining fee. Thus the matter ends. Now, who will venture, in the case supposed, to charge me with corruption; and yet does not every one feel and see that money was the cause of all these operations through which the mind passed? We must take man as he is—if properly constituted, acts of kindness will have their influence upon him, and none can certainly say to what extent they may carry him. Who can be unmoved, while his "enemy is heaping coals of fire upon his head," by doing him acts of kindness, which add to his comforts? Few, if any, who are composed of the common materials.

Mr. President: It appears to me that the Secretary of the Treasury, for the reasons which I have stated, as well as for those which have been stated by others, and which I have no inclination to repeat, had the power to remove the public moneys from the Bank of the United States, and place them in other banks for safe-keeping; and that the conduct of the bank justified the exercise of that power. But, when he came to form an opinion whether it was good policy to exercise it, or not, a question was presented, upon which the warmest friends of the administration, and the sternest opposers of the bank, might well and honestly entertain various opinions. The immense powers of the bank—its great capacity to produce good, or inflict evils upon this community, and the unyielding determination it had manifested to procure a renewal of its charter, if possible, might well make the prudent, the timid if you choose, decline its exercise. But, the deposits have been removed, and with me the question now is, is it good policy to restore them? I say, no. I am opposed to prolonging the charter of this bank; I wish its concerns closed when the charter expires. It is said the country is distressed. I believe it. The deposits have been removed into State banks; and accommodations have been extended on the strength of these deposits. If the deposits are restored, these accommodations must be withdrawn. This will make the confusion greater, and add to the distresses. The United States Bank is under no necessity, as has been clearly demonstrated by the Senator from Missouri, to curtail its accommodations any further at present. If the deposits are restored, the bank will be under no obligations to grant any increased accommodations on account of them: if it does, they must be limited in amount, and for short periods. If the bank is to be wound up, it must collect its debts, and pay what it owes. By restoring the deposits, you put the State banks in the power of this bank to destroy them, and to compel them to suspend specie payments at will. This power, I fear, would be exerted, if it were believed that that was the most certain mode in which to procure a renewal of its charter.

The honorable Senator from Massachusetts thinks the deposits ought to be restored, and the bank re-chartered, and that this is an effectual plan to relieve a distressed community. With the opinions he entertains, his policy is sound. He is correct throughout, and consistent. If I believed, as he does, that we had power to charter a bank, and that this bank was an essential agent for the Government, and its operations a blessing to the community, I would go with him, and say, the deposits ought not to have been removed; they ought to be restored, the bank re-chartered, and society put at rest. But, believing we have no such power, and, if we had, that it ought not to be exercised, to restore these deposits would, I think, aggravate existing distresses, and make "confusion worse confounded."

Mr. President, it has been argued, that if there has been any impropriety in the conduct of the bank, such conduct will find a justification in the conduct of the Chief Magistrate; that he has been guilty of a usurpation of power; that his course has been tyrannical; that he has violated chartered rights, the constitution of his country, and the public faith. These are high charges, made with great freedom, and maintained by distinguished ability. I am not among the number of those who find fault with this course, on the part of those opposed to the administration. Our liberty depends on the freedom with which we examine the conduct of those in high offices. If the charges are not well founded, making them cannot do harm to those against whom they are made; and if well founded, society is benefited by having their misdeeds publicly exposed. The whole of these charges rest upon the supposition that the President has assumed and exercised powers with which he was not vested by the constitution or laws of the United States.

We are here naturally led to inquire what he has done, and what is the nature or character of the power he has exercised.

He has removed one Secretary of the Treasury and appointed another. He called upon the directors of the Bank of the United States, whom, with the advice and consent of the Senate, he had appointed, to report to him the manner in which the business of that institution had been conducted and was conducting. After he received their report, he determined that the public moneys to be collected after the 1st October last, should not be deposited in that bank, but placed in other banks for safe-keeping, until called for to satisfy appropriations made by Congress. The whole power then, which the President has undertaken to exercise, is neither more nor less than this, that he, as the Chief Magistrate, has the power to construe the constitution and laws of the United States, to endeavor to ascertain their true meaning, and then carry that meaning into effect, so far as depends upon his own action, or the action of those inferior officers appointed to aid him in the discharge of his Executive duties. It appears evident to me that he possesses this power, and that his whole duties consist in exercising such powers. He, therefore, has not assumed or taken upon himself to exercise any power which, in its nature, he did possess. In its exercise he may be mistaken; he may think the powers of the constitution or law meant one thing, when they intended another; but this would only be an error in judgment, if unintentional, or an abuse of power, if designed: in neither case would it be an assumption of unauthorized power. In what manner then did he exert this power? He sought the necessary information to enable him and the Secretary of the Treasury to form a correct opinion, whether the power given to the Secretary, in the 16th section of the act incorporating the bank, to remove the public deposits, ought to be exerted or not. When this information was obtained, he came to the conclusion that the public interest required that they should be removed. The then Secretary of the Treasury came to the conclusion that the deposits ought not to be removed, and that as he was the officer appointed by the act to give the order, he was constituted the sole judge, and that the President had no power to control him. He, therefore, refused to give the order, and refused to resign: the President dismissed him, and appointed another, who agreed with him in opinion, and ordered the deposits to be removed. Had the President a constitutional power to do this? I have no doubt he possessed the power. By the first section of the second article of the constitution, the Executive power is vested in the President of the United States. In every Government there are two general classes of power: one to make the law, the other to execute it.

By our constitution, this latter class is subdivided into Judicial and Executive. We, therefore, have three great departments.

1. Congress, to make laws, with the aid of the President, upon all subjects confided, by the constitution, to the General Government.

2. The Judiciary, to expound and enforce or execute the laws confided to that department.

3. And the Executive power, which is vested in the President, and comprehends the whole Executive power given by the constitution, and not expressly conferred somewhere else.

The whole Judicial power is vested in a Supreme Court and such inferior courts as Congress may, from time to time, ordain and establish. The Treasury Department belongs to the Executive, by the constitution. It has no connexion with the power of making laws, therefore belongs not to the Legislative department. It belongs not to the Supreme, or to any inferior court, therefore, is no part of the Judiciary. The only remaining department is the Executive, to which it must belong.

It appears evident to me, that the framers of the constitution intended that the Executive power should be vested in one head, who would be bound not only to discharge faithfully all his own personal duties, but likewise should be clothed with the necessary powers to compel the inferior officers in the Executive department to perform theirs likewise. The President is bound to see that the laws are faithfully executed. This gives him no power over the Judiciary. The courts have their appropriate duties confided to them by the laws and the constitution, and discharge them independently of the Executive. But all Executive officers falling within the Executive department, he has, and must have, a power to control. The heads of Departments are appointed by him; they can only be displaced by him, or by impeachment or conviction. If the Secretary of the Treasury should put an improper construction upon a revenue law, and would neither give up his construction nor retire, he might defeat the collection of the whole revenue before Congress would be in session, unless the President had the power of removing him. In this very case, suppose the President had believed the whole of the money in the bank would be wasted before the session of Congress, and had called upon the Secretary to remove it, and he had refused, saying he conscientiously believed there was no danger, and the President had yielded, from a belief that he had no power to remove him in such a case, and the money had been all wasted; would any man justify the President? I think not. When they conscientiously disagree, one must yield or retire, and that should be the subordinate; otherwise, we have no Executive Government of any practical utility. There is one thing in which I think Mr. Duane was right, and that is in not giving the order for removal, unless he had been convinced his opinion against the removal was wrong; but his error, as I think, consisted in not withdrawing from the Department. While he believed a proper case was not made for the removal, and that a public injury would be done by the removal, no consideration ought to have induced him to sign an order for such a purpose. But if the President believed they ought to be removed, and that a great public injury would result from permitting them to remain, and his Secretary would neither give the order nor retire, I think he had the power to remove him.

But, Mr. President, although I think the Chief Magistrate does possess this power, yet I believe it is one to be exercised with great caution, and only in cases where he is clearly convinced the public interests demand its exercise. This point has been so fully examined, and ably maintained, by gentlemen who have preceded me, that I will no longer dwell upon it.

Had the President a right to call upon the Government directors, and receive reports from them, of the manner in which the business of the bank had been conducted? Some honorable members have denied that he had. On a former occasion, I stated my doubts as to their construction of the charter. Since then, I have examined it with more attention, and am satisfied their limited construction is inaccurate. I will, as briefly as I can, state the reasons which have led to the opinion I entertain.

In our examination of the act incorporating this bank, we ought never to forget, that the very objects of its creation were high national ones: to restore and preserve a sound circulating medium to the community, and to act as fiscal agent, in receiving and paying out the public moneys. To accomplish these important objects, there are to be twenty-five directors to manage the institution; five of these were to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. These directors are to hold their appointments for one year, and until others are appointed; and an express power is given to the President to remove the five Government directors within the year, if he believes the public interest requires it. By the 1st section, the United States are to subscribe for seventy thousand shares, equal to $7,000,000, which is one-fifth of the whole capital. By the 7th section of the act, the stockholders are vested with a power to make such by-laws, rules, and regulations, for the government of the corporation, and for the management of its affairs, as to them may seem proper, not inconsistent with the constitution or laws. In the making of these by-laws, ordinances, rules, and regulations, the United States were to have no voice, no vote. By the 5th rule in the 11th section, it is provided, "that a number of stockholders, not less than sixty, who, together, shall be proprietors of one thousand shares, or upwards, shall have power, at any time, to call a general meeting of the stockholders, for purposes relative to the institution, giving at least ten weeks' notice in two public newspapers of the place where the bank is seated, and specifying in each notice the object or objects of such meeting." By this provision, sixty stockholders, owning one thousand shares, can call a general meeting whenever they have reason to fear their business is mismanaged. They can call their directors to account, and to examine into their whole proceedings, and make any alterations or regulations they think their interest may require. At this general meeting, the United States are unrepresented; they have no voice; they have no vote; they have no person to attend, either to receive or to give any information, although they own seventy thousand shares, worth seven millions. Is it possible for us to suppose the Executive branch of the Government was intended to be excluded from all knowledge of the manner in which the institution was conducted; that the United States, owning one-fifth of the whole stock, should have no voice in making laws for the government of the directors, and no means of knowing whether they conformed their conduct to the laws or not? more especially, that they should have no means of knowing whether the policy prescribed and pursued, was likely to carry into effect the high governmental purpose of preserving a sound currency? I cannot think it possible. Such a construction, I must be permitted to say, with great deference, would, in my judgment, be a severe reflection upon the enlightened men who passed the act.

But if we admit, which I think we ought, that they intended the five Government directors should have an equal agency with any other equal number of directors, in the management of the affairs of the bank, and that they should be bound, at any time, when called upon by the Executive, representing the United States, their constituents, to report to him exactly the same information which the private stockholders, at a general meeting, might demand of their directors, then every thing is consistent and reasonable.

My construction is, I think, very much strengthened by the provision in the 23d section, which enacts "that it shall at all times be lawful for a committee of either House of Congress, appointed for that purpose, to inspect the books and examine into the proceedings of the corporation hereby created, and to report whether the provisions of this charter have been by the same violated or not; and whenever any committee, as aforesaid, shall find and report, or the President of the United States shall have reason to believe, that the charter has been violated, it may be lawful for Congress to direct, or the President to order, a scire facias to be sued out," &c. It must, I think, strike every one reading this section, with great force, that complete power is given to Congress to acquire the most precise information, to enable it to judge whether the charter has been so far violated as to make the issuing a scire facias necessary. In the same section, a power is given to the President to direct a scire facias, if he has reason to believe the charter is violated. From what source is he to acquire a knowledge of facts, upon which to found his opinion? Not the report of the committee. Congress is to act upon it, if any person. It would be absurd to suppose that it was intended Congress should procure the information, and not order any scire facias, and that the President should, upon the same report, direct one to be issued. Congress was to act upon the report of its own committee; the President to give his direction upon information derived from some other source, and that source is the report of the directors whom he had appointed, and had a power to remove, for faithless or unwise conduct. This construction is farther confirmed, when we see in the same section, that in the scire facias, the facts which it is supposed have constituted a violation of the charter, must be set down so precisely, that an issue can be taken upon them and tried by a jury. What has been alleged in favor of the opposite construction? Nothing, except that it is said the five Government directors shall, with the other twenty, manage and direct the bank. To single out a single expression or paragraph, and fix the meaning from that alone, is not the sound rule of interpretation; we must take the whole act, compare one part with another, and fix the meaning from the context. Or, what is still more correct, we must ascertain the spirit and meaning of the act, and give it such interpretation as will give effect to the will of the law-giver. If my construction needs farther aid, its correctness is proved beyond question, by the debates when the act was under consideration. Those who opposed that provision in the charter which allows directors to be appointed, insisted the provision should be stricken out, because these directors would be "spies" and informers. The friends to the provision say it ought to be retained, because we want these directors as "sentinels on the watch-tower," to give information. By what rule, then, is it, that we are to say the Executive has violated the charter, in calling for these reports, or the directors for having made them? By none heretofore recognised as a sound one. The true rule is, to ascertain what the legislature intended when they were enacting the law, and then say that is its construction now. My view of this subject is rendered still more certain by the opinion of a distinguished gentleman from New York, who was at the head of a most respectable committee of the House of Representatives, in November, 1818. They had given this charter, and the proceedings of the directors under it, a laborious examination, and had maturely considered the whole subject. One paragraph in their report, connected with a proposition of Mr. Spencer, the chairman, shortly afterwards, shows conclusively his opinion upon this point. The report is in these words:

"Two by-laws of the bank seem to your committee to deserve notice: one of them, 'that no discounts shall be made without the consent of three-fourths of the directors present;' and another, 'that no director shall, without especial authority, be permitted to inspect the cash account of any person with the bank.' These by-laws appear to render nugatory the provisions of the charter authorizing the appointment, by the Government, of one-fifth of the whole number of directors, and are different from the provisions, in that respect, by the former Bank of the United States, although most of the local banks in Philadelphia have similar regulations. Should a state of things exist, in which the stockholders should deem their interest hostile to that of the nation, such provisions as these stated would render the Government directors mere spectators of the proceedings of the board."

The proposition afterwards submitted by Mr. Spencer, contained various matters, intended as amendments of the charter. The 5th is in these words:

"That no by-law of the said corporation shall exclude the directors appointed by the Government from a full knowledge of all the concerns of the bank, and of the accounts of every person dealing with it; and that the assent of at least one public director shall be necessary, to allow any discount, and to render valid every act of the board of directors."

By the report, it is obvious the draughtsman and a majority of the committee, at least, were of opinion that the Government directors were bound to report whatever information they could acquire. Mr. Spencer believed that the by-laws restricted them too much, and that they ought to have access to every account in the bank, as well the private accounts of individuals as the general accounts. Why enlarge the field in which these directors were to collect information, unless they were at liberty to communicate all they could collect, when required? Thus, then, it seems to me, the context, the spirit, and meaning, of the charter, compel us to conclude Congress intended the Government directors should make reports. The friends and enemies of the charter agreed that that was the intention at the time the act was on its passage, and such has been considered its construction ever since, until this controversy. If the contrary is now settled to be its meaning, and the directors are not at liberty to communicate any information; if the whole proceedings of the board, and all the operations of this great moneyed institution, in which the Government has so much at hazard, and which can so materially affect every interest in the community, are to be kept profound secrets, then I must be permitted to believe it is too odious and too dangerous to be tolerated one moment longer than we are now compelled to allow it to exist.

Mr. President, I have now discharged a duty, far from pleasing to myself. It was due to those who sent me, as well as to others, that from my place in this body I should state the reasons upon which I expect to rest my votes. Having done so, I will only add my acknowledgments to the Senate for their patient attention, after the subject had been so long and so ably discussed, as to have left no hope that any thing I could say would be matter of interest either here or elsewhere.

TUESDAY, MARCH 25.

NORTH CAROLINA MEMORIALS.

Mr. MANGUM presented a memorial from the village of Wilkesboro', in the western part of the State of North Carolina, at the foot of the Alleghany mountains, complaining of the violation of law and assumption of power by the Executive, in the removal of the deposits. By a letter which he had received, he was informed that, of the signers of this memorial, nine-tenths had recently been the friends of the administration, and in favor of General Jackson and his measures.

Mr. M. also presented a memorial from the citizens of Halifax county, North Carolina, complaining of the removal of the public deposits, and praying for their restoration to the United States Bank. He was personally acquainted with most of the petitioners, and he could say that they were highly respectable. They complained of the violation of law and assumption of power by the Executive. They pray that Congress will interfere and arrest the distress which pervades the country, which they believe may be checked by the restoration of the deposits.

Mr. M. moved that the memorials be read, and referred to the Committee on Finance; which was agreed to.

MARYLAND BANKS.

Mr. CLAY rose and said that he had heard, and he presumed that every member of the Senate had also heard, that, yesterday, a bank, chartered by the State of Maryland, and situated in Baltimore, had stopped payment. The evidence of the fact was to be found in the public prints of this morning. He had further heard, as he also presumed most of the Senate had heard, that, in consequence of a connexion, supposed or actual, between the Bank of Maryland, which had thus exploded, and the Union Bank of Maryland, one of the banks selected by the Treasury Department as a depository of the public revenue, there was, yesterday, an immense run on the latter bank. The information which reached him was, that the streets of Baltimore, in the vicinity of the bank, were yesterday crowded by people pressing to obtain metallic currency for the paper in their hands. The connexion between the two banks was so intimate, that great danger was apprehended as to the stability of the Union Bank.

In this Union Bank, it appeared, from the returns made by the Treasury Department, that the Secretary of the Treasury was himself a stockholder. To what extent the Secretary was a stockholder, did not appear, but his name was to be found on the list of the stockholders of the Union Bank, one of the banks selected by him for the reception and charge of the public deposits. He had heard that the Secretary was a stockholder to a considerable extent. He had heard that the stock held by the Secretary in that bank constituted a considerable part of his property; and that he had been for some time a director in that bank, previous to his removal to this city.

He hoped that it would turn out that the Union Bank was in a safe condition; and that there were no just grounds for the apprehension which seemed to exist, as to its safety. He hoped it would turn out that the Secretary of the Treasury was not a stockholder in this bank to any extent which could authorize an impression that he had suffered his own interests to enter into the considerations which led him to select this bank as one of the depositories of the public money.

He had also heard this morning, but he would not undertake to vouch for the truth of the rumor, that, in consequence of the connexion between the Union Bank and the Bank of Maryland, a Treasury draft, or Treasury drafts, to the amount of 150,000 dollars, had, in the course of the last few days, been furnished to the Union Bank of Maryland, by the Secretary of the Treasury. He did not know how far this rumor was founded in fact, but he did know that it was the official duty of the Senate to inquire into the fact, whether there was any danger to the public interests which was likely to result from the circumstance of the public money being in that institution.

After these remarks, he would submit the following resolution, and would ask that it might be considered at this time, in order that an early reply might be received from the Secretary:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to the Senate what amount of public money is now on deposit in the Union Bank of Maryland, and on what account it was deposited; and whether any Treasury drafts, contingent or other, have been, during the month of March, 1834, furnished to the said bank, to enable it to meet any demands which might be made upon it.

The motion to consider the resolution requiring the unanimous consent of the Senate—

Mr. FORSYTH rose and said, that if the gentleman from Kentucky had introduced the resolution without any remarks, he would not have interposed any objection to its adoption. But, after what had been said, he thought it was due to the Secretary of the Treasury that he should have an opportunity of seeing the resolution. The fact of the Secretary of the Treasury being a stockholder in the Union Bank of Maryland, was on record, but the extent to which he was interested was not known. He did not imagine, however, that it would be found, on examination, that the Secretary held sufficient stock to render it an object with him to select this bank for the custody of any part of the public money. He objected to the consideration of the resolution at this time.

Mr. CLAY said he would make one single remark. As he had already stated, he did not know the amount of stock held by the Secretary in the Union Bank. He had heard that it was a considerable sum, and this he had heard when he was in Baltimore. The fact, however, was apparent, that he had stock in the institution, and therefore the inquiry was a proper one.

The resolution was then laid over until to-morrow.

MEMORIAL FROM PHILADELPHIA.

Mr. CLAYTON presented certain resolutions adopted at a large public meeting of silversmiths, watchmakers, jewellers, &c. of the city of Philadelphia. He stated the substance of the resolutions, and expressed his regret that an earlier opportunity for the presentation of them had been denied him, in consequence of the great press of business before the Senate.

Mr. C. proceeded to enforce the opinions and arguments adopted at the meeting, by comments on the respectability of those who advanced them, and the peculiar character of the meeting. It was composed of a class of men whose business was, of all others perhaps, most affected by disastrous fluctuations in the currency, being the manufacture and sale of such articles as are most liable to be dispensed with by a suffering people in any state of general embarrassment; and he held it due to the Senate to observe that, from the intelligence and integrity of those whose names appeared on the face of the proceedings, the sentiments advanced in reference to a subject which necessarily engaged so much of their attention as men of business, were entitled to be weighed with the highest respect by this honorable body. On his motion, the resolutions were read, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

THE CUMBERLAND ROAD.

Mr. HENDRICKS rose to ask the Senate to take up the appropriation bill for the continuation of the Cumberland road, in Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois; which was taken up and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WILKINS offered an amendment to the bill, appropriating $300,000 for repairing the road east of the Ohio; and Mr. TIPTON another amendment, authorizing an officer of the corps of engineers to superintend the work and disburse the money in Indiana and Illinois.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN wished for explanation, especially in regard to the proposed appropriation for the repair of the road; he thought it had been given up to the States. He moved to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. EWING said, it was designed only to finish it where it had been begun, and east of Wheeling to repair it where it had been broken up. It had not been given up to the States; it was first to be repaired by the United States, and formerly an appropriation had been made for this purpose, that it might then be given up to the States; but the sum for repairs had not been sufficient. The design of the $300,000 was to complete the repairs, that it might then be given up to the States, and they could not get rid of the road without such an appropriation. Not being now repaired, it must remain on their hands, to be again and again repaired.

Mr. HENDRICKS said they would all recollect that in 1832 an agreement had been made with the legislatures of Maryland, Ohio, and Indiana, that they should receive the road as soon as it should be repaired; and the Government was thus pledged to repair it and give it up to the States; it was under an obligation to do so, from which it could not be shielded. Toll gates could not be erected by the Government to procure the means of keeping the road in repair, on account of constitutional difficulties, which did not exist in regard to the States, which, when it was once repaired, might thus keep it in repair.

Mr. WILKINS said, the bill and the amendment which he had offered to the Senate, put the question at once, whether or not they would now abandon this project altogether. He was interested in the subject simply in a national point of view, because, to give up the road, would carry the travel through the city of Pittsburg, where he resided. The system now proposed would ultimately terminate in getting the nation rid of the road entirely, and it was the object of the amendment to carry out the system.

Mr. PRESTON would be glad to know whether the amendment offered by Mr. WILKINS had been reported by the Committee on Roads and Canals?

Mr. WILKINS said it was in the bill before the House, and not in that before the Senate.

Mr. PRESTON thought it important that such an appropriation should be made for the repair of the road this side of the Ohio, as to put the road in such a state that the States would receive it. They would not now receive it, and it was not fit for their reception without additional expense; but if appropriations continued to be made in the manner they had been, there would be no termination to the expense. He desired to be informed in this matter, for he was not prepared to act upon it. The bill as reported by the committee was a matter of course, but it was not so clearly so in regard to the appropriation.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN said he was satisfied with the explanation, precisely because it was an explanation. He thought it was the spirit of the understanding between the Government and the States that the road should be repaired and then delivered to the States. There was no other inducement to make the repairs but to get rid of this miserable bargain. After millions had been expended on the road, they were now told that thousands and hundreds of thousands must yet be expended east of the Ohio, and that it was a miserable road, and he was disposed to grant the appropriation.

SENATE.]

Cumberland Road.—Re-chartering Bank United States.

[MARCH 25, 1864.]

Mr. WILKINS could not tell why the amendment was not in the bill before the Senate. It was intended that there should not be a repetition of repairs, and the money was to be applied where no repairs had been made. Last year there was a partial repair of the road, which was now going on, and the object of this appropriation was to repair what had not been done.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, said that this road was an old acquaintance of his, and they had expended not only hundreds of thousands, but millions upon it. It was constructed under the direction of most skillful persons, and they had been told that it would be a national monument, a most magnificent work. But Congress had become wearied of it, for they found no end to it. Year after year, for twenty years, appropriations had been made to the Cumberland road, and at length they had come to the conclusion that they had best get rid of this extraordinary expenditure. Year after year expenses had been incurred, and it was reported to grow worse and worse. Mr. K. went into a detailed history of the origin and progress of the various appropriations.

Mr. HENDRICKS explained: It had never been said that any particular appropriation would be found sufficient to finish the road. A much greater degree of expense and difficulty had been incurred than was at first contemplated. The lime stone, of which it was found necessary to construct the road, lay at a considerable depth in the earth, was covered with a stratum of stone of a different description, and could only be produced at places which were distant from the spot where it was required to be used. In the general bill presented to the committee, a considerable portion of the road had not been included.

Mr. EWING confirmed the statement of the Senator from Indiana, and added, that the doubts expressed by the Senator from Alabama, as to whether the States would receive the road when completed, indicated an apprehension of a degree of bad faith on the part of those States which he (Mr. E.) did not think would ever be exercised. The road had never yet been placed in a condition that would warrant the States in taking it into their charge. When it should be presented to them by the engineer now employed, with a declaration that it had been completed in a proper manner, and they should refuse to receive it, then it would be time for Congress to cease making appropriations. The road had never yet been in a fit condition to be offered to the States, in consequence of its construction having been superintended by an individual who was incompetent to the task, and who had been appointed from political motives. The road was now, however, under the direction of a skillful engineer, and was properly attended to; difficulties had arisen, but they had been manfully met and surmounted. The road in its original state had been made of improper materials; had speedily got out of repair, and eventually became impassable; none of the States could take possession of it then, without coming in contact with the General Government, and now they refused to have any thing to do with it unless it was put into a perfect state of repair. If that were done, the States would immediately take charge of it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN said he had been looking into some documents, and found that the estimate for the formation of this road, instead of being $300,000, was $645,000, and before it was finished he had no doubt the expenditure would amount to a million and a half of dollars. It appeared to him that a new road was intended to be made. He thought Congress ought to pause upon this subject, and would, therefore, renew his motion to lay it upon the table.

Mr. POINDEXTER said the Senator from New Jersey seemed to think that the road was to be newly made; now a portion of it had been already Macadamized; the appropriation was required to finish it. The stone for this purpose was already there. The department had recommended that the large stones which had formerly been used for the road should be taken up: this had been done and a great expense would thus be saved. The road in question was the great mail route which connected the Western country with the seat of Government, and was at present utterly impassable, excepting at the risk of life and limb. He looked upon the matter as one of great national importance, and was of opinion that the road should be perfected and then given up to the care of the States.

Mr. WILKINS said the road from Cumberland to Wheeling was already Macadamized. The expense of completing the remainder of the route would depend upon the materials made use of. If clay were employed, the expenditure would amount to $165,000; if sand or slate-stone, $300,000; and if it were Macadamized—if the hardest and most durable materials were used, the expense would be $646,000. To use a Western expression, "their hands were in a split log"—they had commenced Macadamizing the road—and the only way was to go on with it. It was to finish the road that this appropriation was required.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN renewed his motion to lay the matter on the table, and called for the yeas and nays. The sense of the Senate being taken in this manner, Mr. F.'s motion prevailed.

RE-CHARTERING BANK UNITED STATES.

The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of the special order, being the leave asked by Mr. WEBSTER to introduce his bill.

Mr. WHITE resumed and concluded the speech which he commenced yesterday, as given entire in preceding pages. When he had concluded, a number of members endeavored to obtain the floor.

Mr. CLAY succeeded, but yielded to

Mr. WEBSTER, who rose and said, that, when he moved for leave to introduce this bill, he could not have anticipated that gentlemen on the other side of the House would have seized the occasion to transfer to this motion, the debate which was going on, upon the resolutions offered by the honorable gentleman from Kentucky. I availed myself, said Mr. W., of the common indulgence to explain the nature of the proposed measure, and to make some remarks on the general state of things, which in my opinion rendered its introduction expedient. This is usual, and though for myself, if other reasons did not exist, I should not wish to prevent debate, even at this early stage, from going to any length, yet I cannot consent, by acquiescing in that course, to do injustice to the important subject previously existing before the Senate. It is due to the importance of that subject, to public expectation, and to the gentleman who introduced those resolutions, to allow him to bring the discussion of them to a close, and to take the sense of the Senate upon them. I feel bound, therefore, to adopt some course which shall give to the Senate possession again of the resolutions of the gentleman from Kentucky. In the meantime, my only present object is answered. I have repeatedly expressed the opinion, that no relief will be had, until it come from the influence of opinion among the people. I am perfectly satisfied, in the present distracted state of sentiment in Washington, that nothing will be done until public opinion compels it, and that public opinion must not only be urgent, and urgently expressed, in favor of relief, generally, but that it must go further, and must indicate some distinct measure of relief. I need not advert to those obvious reasons which make it absolutely necessary that public opinion, among the people, should assume some definite form, and point to some specific remedy, in order that opinions here may harmonize. With these views, I have proposed this measure. I believe it the best—the most conciliating—the simplest—and the most practicable. It is now before the people. Those who believe in the necessity of some immediate remedy, will consider it, compare it with other propositions, and make up their minds upon it. So soon as there shall be time to learn something of the general sense of those who believe it the duty of Congress to do something, say a month hence, or about the first of May, I shall proceed with the measure. I move, therefore, to lay it on the table.

Mr. FORSYTH asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered; and

The question was taken, and decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Black, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Ewing, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, King of Ga., Mangum, Moore, Naudain, Poindexter, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Silsbee, Smith, Southard, Sprague, Swift, Tomlinson, Waggaman, Webster.—24.

NAYS.—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Forsyth, Grundy, Hill, Kane, King of Alabama, Morris, Robinson, Shepley, Tallmadge, Tipton, White, Wilkins, Wright.—15.

So the motion was laid on the table; and the Senate took up Mr. CLAY's resolutions, &c., on the subject of the

REMOVAL OF THE DEPOSITES.

Mr. CLAY then inquired whether the gentleman from New York [Mr. WRIGHT] designed to speak on the other special order, (Mr. C.'s resolutions relative to the removal of the deposits.) If he did not, he (Mr. C.) wished to make some remarks himself, in reply to some gentlemen who had already spoken.

Mr. WRIGHT was understood to express a wish to make a few observations upon the first resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky.

The Senate, then, on motion, adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 26.

PUBLIC DISTRESS.

Mr. SOUTHARD presented the proceedings of a meeting, held on the 14th of the present month, in the city of Philadelphia, composed entirely of the young men of that city and neighborhood, ascribing the present calamitous condition of the country to the removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States. On presenting these memorials—

Mr. S. said: On the 14th of this month, a meeting was held in the city of Philadelphia, at which 25 persons were appointed to proceed to this place, for the purpose of having the proceedings of the meeting properly presented to Congress, and suitable means used to effect their objects. It was also resolved to forward to me a copy of their proceedings, to be laid before the Senate. I comply, with great cheerfulness, with their request, and now offer them to your consideration. The meeting was not of an ordinary character, nor composed of individuals usually found in political, or other public meetings. It was called by more than 5,000 young men, and composed entirely of young men—a portion of them not yet belonging to any of the parties into which the politicians of the country have been divided; who have, as yet, assumed no party name, and learned to follow no party leader. They have no name written upon their standards, or marked upon their foreheads. The only flag which they have used, is that of their common country. The members of the committee, I believe, never before attended, and took part as actors, in any public and political meeting. None of that vast assemblage are too young to take a deep interest in their country's welfare, nor to be ambitious—ambitious of future and honorable distinction—but a large proportion are yet too young to be office-seekers, or to look for present and speedy reward, for political and party services, or be misguided by bank accommodations. They are neither hackneyed politicians nor veteran partisans. They can have but one object—the prosperity of their country; and can be influenced only by those feelings which appropriately belong to youth, intelligence, and patriotism. With but very few of them am I personally acquainted—and must rely, in what I say of them, upon what I know of those few, and upon the information received from others, which I regard as sure and safe. And on these, I venture to assure the Senate, that no meeting of young men can be collected, in any portion of our wide country, on any occasion, containing more intelligence—more virtuous purpose—more manly and honorable feeling—more decided and energetic character. What they say, they think. What they resolve, they will accomplish. Their proceedings were ardent and animated—their resolutions are drawn with spirit; but are such as, I think, may be properly received and respected by the Senate. They relate to the conduct of the Executive—to the present condition of the country—to the councils which now direct its destinies. They admit that older and more mature judgments may better understand the science of Government and its practical operations, but they act upon a feeling just in itself, and valuable in its effects, that they are fit to form and express opinions on public measures and public principles, which shall be their own guide in their present and future conduct; and they express a confident reliance on the moral and physical vigor and untamable love of freedom of the young men of the United States to save us from despotism, open and avowed, or silent, insidious, and deceitful. They were attracted, or rather urged, sir, to this meeting, and to the expression of their feelings and opinions, by what they saw around, and knew of the action of the Executive upon the currency and prosperity of the country. They have just entered, or are about entering, on the busy occupations of manhood, and are suddenly surprised by a state of things around them, new to their observation and experience. Calamity had been a stranger in their pathway. They have grown up through their boyhood in the enjoyments of present comfort, and the anticipations of future prosperity—their seniors actively and successfully engaged in the various occupations of the community, and the whole circle of employments open before their own industry and hopes—the institutions of their country beloved, and their protecting influence covering the exertions of all for their benefit and happiness. In this state they saw the public prosperity, with which alone they were familiar, blasted, and for the time destroyed. The whole scene, their whole country, was changed; they witnessed fortunes falling, homesteads ruined, merchants failing, artisans broken, mechanics empoverished, all the employments on which they were about to enter, paralyzed; labor denied to the needy, and reward to the industrious; losses of millions of property, and gloom settling where joy and happiness before existed. They felt the sirocco pass by, and desolate the plains where peace, and animation, and happiness exulted. Sir, they recollected, perhaps, that memorable and most denounced declaration, that to free institutions, and in a land of freedom, there is an evil more dreadful than war, pestilence, and famine. When they counted up the cost of a five months' experiment upon the prosperity and happiness of the country, and remembered what they had seen and read of those calamities, they were scarcely permitted to doubt the truth of that declaration, or the application of the prophecy. They inquired into and expressed their belief in the cause of the evils; and they looked beyond the pecuniary distress to the political principles on which the act of the Executive was to be palliated, excused, or justified; and in strong terms express their opinions, and denounce these principles. The act itself they regard as one of high-handed power, which spurns constitutional checks, and overleaps the barriers prepared by our fathers against arbitrary Governments; as destroying confidence in the currency of the country, and the policy of the Government, and the stability of our institutions; and meriting the deep and lasting execrations of an injured and outraged people. I will not detain the Senate by a more particular statement of the substance of the resolutions on these points; but, sir, they add some declarations worthy of reflection to those in power, when the numbers, age, and character of these young men is considered. They give a pledge of their honorable exertions at the polls, to remove those who have committed violence upon our prosperity and done wrong to our institutions. They feel that, after a little, they, and not we, are to decide on the interests of the nation—they, and not we, are to bear its burdens and share its blessings—they, and not we, will have to answer to coming time for all the good which Providence has bestowed. It is only under such feelings that the youth of our country can be brought to that standard of action and conduct which free institutions demand. And believing, as I do, that they will keep their pledge, and be sustained by a mighty band of competitors in their patriotic struggle, I unite with them, in declaring that I “do not despair of the republic.”

Mr. S. then moved that the proceedings be read, printed, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PRESTON then rose, and said: I rise, Mr. President, for the double purpose of seconding (which I do by the request of the memorialists) the motion of the Senator from New Jersey, and of announcing to the Senate, that, when that motion is disposed of, I will have the honor of presenting to the Senate a memorial from the 3d Congressional district of Pennsylvania. I shall avail myself of the present occasion to submit what I have to say upon both memorials.

That which is now under the formal consideration of the Senate is distinguished from all others which have been heretofore received, in this, that whereas heretofore memorials have been presented either from promiscuous assemblages of citizens, or from assemblages of citizens of particular avocations, as merchants, manufacturers, &c., but all representing the great, active, and what may be called the political body of the community, the present memorialists are not designated from the mass of our citizens by trade, or calling, or pursuits in life, but are distinguished from it by the fact, that they are young men. Four thousand young men sign the memorial before us, and venture to suggest their sentiments to the Senate of the United States. It is obvious that those who defend the measures of the administration, and whose business it is to detract from the efficacy of every manifestation of public opinion, will be prompt with the inquiry, By what title to respect do the young men of Philadelphia claim the consideration of the Senate? Why should those, who are just beginning to look upon life, assume to express opinions upon the gravest and most complex concerns? For my part, said Mr. P., I think I can perceive in these proceedings a most instructive lesson.

Ours, Mr. President, is not altogether a Government of opinion. It is not sustained merely by the reason and conviction of those upon whom it operates; but finds a more ready and efficient support in the instinctive emotions of the hearts of our citizens. Public sentiment is the result of reason and of feeling; and in an enlightened community, devoted to free institutions, and deeply imbued with the spirit of liberty, conclusions as to public measures frequently outstrip the slow process of argument, and are not the less right and just, because that process has not been laboriously gone through with logical precision. This Government cannot be sustained—indeed, sir, no Government can stand, unless it finds a large support in the generous emotions, the intelligent instincts, and enlightened affections of its citizens, which rally around it, or recoil from its measures, as they conform to or oppose its general spirit. There are times in all countries, in which the greatest statesman may inform his judgment by his heart—when the truest wisdom is to be found in his pulse—when his wisest lesson may be taught by those classes of society who feel most deeply and keenly. Especially, sir, in our Government, which reposes so broadly upon the reason and affections of its citizens, may we be instructed by all those manifestations of public sentiment which may be supposed to indicate these combined results; even when those from whom they come may be supposed to be under a preponderating influence of sincere feeling.

It may happen, sir, that the influences of youthful ardor have as little effect in giving bias to the judgment, as the peculiar pursuits, the accidental interests, and, above all, the party spirit, of those who have entered fully into the more strenuous pursuits of life. If these memorialists are young, they are unsophisticated—if their judgment be considered immature, let it be remembered that their hearts are sound and generous; and, above all, let us not forget that these gentlemen express what the bold, the generous, the untrammelled, and the unselfish feel; and, if you please, sir, that they reflect and indicate the emotions which so profoundly agitate our country from one end to the other. It is obvious, sir, that a deep feeling of anxiety has taken possession of the public mind; a feeling independent of actual suffering, and independent too of a full perception of the extent of the misrule to which we are subjected. It is not only those whose fortunes and hopes in life have been prostrated. It is not only those who stand upon the brink of ruin, and look to each coming day with dread of its results. It is not only those whose business or habit it is to mark the progress of political changes, and note coming events in the shadows which they cast before them. To none of these classes belong the memorialists before us; but, every order of society, every condition of life, all ages, and both sexes, are aroused by the blow which has been struck, by the Executive, upon that cord which binds every heart to our common country; and these memorialists, sir, when they declare that the laws have been violated, and the constitution endangered, find an echo in every man's bosom. It will be found that the memorialists confine themselves to these topics. These are the topics which occupy and agitate the community; and so absorbing have been the feelings excited by the seizure of the public money, so much has it astounded and alarmed the public mind, that all other subjects have been forgotten, all other acts of misrule overlooked, while this has claimed an exclusive and intense attention.

It has been said, that an earthquake reeled unheededly away in the eagerness of an ancient battle; and thus the deep and absorbing interest of the present contest may be estimated, by the entire indifference or neglect of Executive proceedings, which, in the ordinary state of the public mind, would excite to inquiry, and demand reprobation. Let us subdue our feelings for a moment, and pause to look around upon the events in the midst of which we are.

Mr. President, Congress assembled with the announcement of the fact, that the Post Office Department was bankrupt; that it had been bankrupt for years; and that the nation had been deluded, time after time, with a false account of its prosperity; that half a million of dollars had, without warrant of law, or knowledge of the legislature, been borrowed (to feed its prodigality) upon the faith of the Government. Money is raised without law. Money is appropriated without law. Erroneous accounts, false balances, have been presented to the legislature, and so announced in the President's message. Has any one looked into these accounts? Have your committees examined into and reported upon these matters. Has the President instituted an investigation or punished the delinquent officers, or has this most flagrant violation of all law roused the indignation of the country? Sir, the times in which we live leave no leisure for such small affairs.

Mr. P. proceeded. How is it, sir, with the other great Departments of the Government? What is the situation of that very Department whose misdemeanor has thrown every thing else into the back ground? Was the act performed by the Secretary of the Treasury? No, sir, by the President's Secretary. The Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. McLane, was removed to make way for a man who would perform this daring act: he was tried and refused; a third answered the purpose, and he is not yet a constitutional Secretary. He is yet, in the midst of all the fiscal difficulties in which we are involved—he is yet the President's Secretary, having been neither confirmed by or offered for confirmation to the Senate. Congress has been in session four months, and there is no Secretary of State, no Secretary of the Treasury, no Attorney General, "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate." These three great departments are filled and exercised by those whose titles have not received the constitutional sanction. A power, which was conferred upon the President to supply accidental vacancies during the recess, is seized upon to supersede the constitutional functions of the Senate. By his own act he makes the vacancy, fills it with his own choice, and keeps his own officer independent of the Senate. Never, in the history of our Government, have the Departments exhibited so extraordinary a spectacle; and yet so deeply agitated has been the public mind, that even the newspaper press has scarcely alluded to it.

Look, sir, to the state of our representation at foreign courts. Russia is kept open, for what purpose the professor to Mr. Duane may explain. We have no minister in England, although it is now two years since the President declared that there was a delicate and important negotiation pending there; and coupled with this, there is a rumor, or general understanding, that the station is promised to a gentleman now performing the functions of a Representative on the floor of Congress. Whether this rumor be true or false, Mr. P. said, he did not pretend to give an opinion. What he meant to state was, that neither the protracted vacancy, or the idea that a Representative was holding his seat under the promise of an Executive office, had produced any sensation upon the public mind, and proves how deeply that public mind is occupied, when such things do not affect it.

Five years ago, still more, ten years ago, if the President had ordered a company of infantry, or half a company of artillery, from one point of the country to another, a general curiosity would have pervaded our great community. But now, sir, troops are concentrated from the whole continent on a single point; a sovereign State is beleaguered, and its seaports blockaded, by a standing army subservient to Executive orders; troops are marched and counter-marched, from Carolina to Alabama, without inquiry or explanation; a citizen has been put to death by the soldiery. Against these things a few gentlemen, whose duty it was to look into them, have exclaimed, but it was a voice in the wilderness. The public have been too much engaged to listen. Looking round upon these things, a Senator from Kentucky, some time since, told us that we were in the midst of a revolution, hitherto bloodless. This exception can no longer be made. The papers inform us that blood has been spilt; that a citizen, peacefully returning from the exercise of his constitutional right to assemble with his fellow-citizens and petition for a redress of grievances, has lost his life by the supporters of the administration. I do not pretend, said Mr. P., to prejudge the guilt of the transaction, but to call the attention of gentlemen to the fact, of how little excitement the communication of this event has produced—an event calculated to arouse a universal indignation —to excite the strongest sympathies—which would have led, in Great Britain, to an instantaneous investigation by Parliament; but now, the public mind is so profoundly pre-occupied, that no sensation has been created. Let gentlemen, who deny that there is excitement in the country, tell us how it is that these events are passing without notice. The truth is, sir, that the public mind has been wrought into such a tempest by the President's seizure of the Treasury, that every other matter is for the moment forgotten. Where, but a short time since, the falling of a pebble would have rippled the whole surface, a ship now sinks unmarked.

But, (said Mr. P.) there is one feature in the character of these times that is more alarming to my mind, than all the open acts of misrule that have yet been perpetrated. It is the bold assumption by the President, and avowed here, that he is the Government. It is the entire disorganization of the accustomed powers of the Executive branch of the Government. We might abstract our opinions, and have hopes of the republic, if the President was sustained as in former administrations, by distinguished, responsible, and known men. It is generally understood that his cabinet is against him; and, Mr. P. said, he regretted to hear from the distinguished Senator from Georgia, the other day, that he had no means of information of Executive proceedings not common to every Senator. Would to God that he had! There would be some security in his coolness, information, and ability; but there is none in the concentration of all power in the unguided will of one man, the heady current of whose passions, receiving (if gentlemen choose) additional impetuosity from honesty of purpose, beats down every impediment of law or constitution.

Mr. P. said, that he was not one of those who had opposed the measure of the Executive mainly on the ground of the distress it had occasioned—he had denounced it principally as a violation of law, and as a dangerous usurpation of power by the Executive. Not that I am insensible to the wide-spread havoc which has desolated the country. No one can sit here unmoved, and see from day to day the petitions, memorials, and remonstrances, laid upon the table. No period of our history has witnessed the like. They are poured in upon us in a never-ceasing shower. They have gone on increasing to that extent, that we scarcely have time to read them. It was consolatory to hear from the Senator from Missouri, that, in his judgment, we were approaching the period of our intolerable sufferings. He stated that the bank, having curtailed its discounts to the extent of the public money removed from it, would have no pretext to go farther. Gentlemen say, wait yet a little longer, and all will be quiet! Ay, sir, all will be quiet when bankruptcy has paid off the debts of the country—when expiring credit can make no further effort to sustain itself—when the eager struggles of yet unextinguished hope subside into sullen despair—when the storm finds nothing left to beat upon—then there will be quiet. Gentlemen make a solitude, and call it peace. I have wondered that the country has yet strength or patience to continue their petitions. The tornado that swept over England in 1825 was not of as long duration, and of but little less violence, than that we have just witnessed.

Sir, (said Mr. P.) I trust that the prayers of our fellow-citizens will be answered. The memorial presented by the Senator from New Jersey adds to their numbers, and when it is disposed of, I shall have the honor of presenting another, signed by 4,677 voters in the third Congressional district of Pennsylvania, which I will propose shall take the same course.

Mr. BROWN said, that the remarks which had fallen from the gentleman who had just addressed the Chair, [Messrs. SOUTHARD and PAXTON,] seemed to require from him some reply; but, before he proceeded farther,

SENATE.]

Public Distress.

he would take occasion to compliment gentlemen on the other side, on their having recovered the position that they had for some time lost sight of. Their strong political phalanx seemed to have been wavering. He began to think that all was not well with them; that they did not command that entire unity of action which formerly distinguished them. They told us at one time, (said Mr. B.,) that the violated laws, and an outraged constitution, was the only issue before the Senate; and when we told them that the re-charter of the Bank of the United States was the only true issue, that was stoutly met and denied. A bill to re-charter the bank had been presented a few days ago, and the honorable gentleman who introduced it opened the debate with a full discussion on all its merits, and with an ingenuity characteristic of able parliamentary leaders; that issue had been withdrawn, and the notes of distress were again sounded. He again congratulated gentlemen on the recovery of their former position.

The honorable Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PIERCE] prefaced his remarks by saying that one of the circumstances peculiarly marking the present times was the presentation of a memorial from the young men of the country. What do we see? (said Mr. B.) For the first time in the history of the country, the young men brought forward to fight the battles of the Bank of the United States; and this showed the talismanic power of that institution, that they were able to mingle such incongruous elements in the conflict. What do we see? he again asked. Why, the bank reduced to the necessity, after having undergone a review before the people of the United States, and discomfited there, of taking refuge among a parcel of boys. The honorable gentleman continues to harp upon the great distress prevailing throughout the country; and what does he infer from this? That the people are opposed to the administration on this bank question? Did the elections give any evidence of the kind? Had there been a single election since, that had not given the administration a triumphant majority? Witness the elections in Virginia, in New Hampshire, and every where that elections have been held. How, then, did the gentleman infer that the people were against the administration on this bank question, when the elections gave such undeniable evidence to the contrary? The honorable gentleman had gone on to inquire into the state of our foreign relations, and he would take upon himself to answer him. There never had been a time, since the formation of our Government, when our foreign relations were conducted with such unparalleled success; and with what dignity and skill, might be read in a nation's hearts, and find an approving throb in every patriot bosom. It appeared to him that this was rather an unfortunate topic for the gentleman to advert to. Matters of old controversy with foreign powers, which had heretofore baffled the skill of the ablest negotiators, had been settled, and satisfactorily settled, under this administration. The gentleman had spoken of the vacancies in our diplomatic corps; but he (Mr. B.) was not aware of any foreign court at which the United States were not represented, either by a minister or a chargé; and, as to Russia, the gentleman must be aware that it was but a very short time since our minister to that court had returned home. The gentleman asked why we were not represented at the court of England? Now, he believed that a satisfactory answer to that question might be found in the circumstance that the appointments of the Executive to that court had not always met with the approbation of the Senate. A few years ago, the appointment of a minister to England was made, and with what success, the history of that body (the Senate) would show. Again: the gentleman had referred to the tendency of this Government to concentrate power in the hands of one man; but, if there was such a one, he could only say there was a counter tendency in the people towards the support of liberty. Did not the gentleman perceive a tendency in the Bank of the United States towards an unauthorized assumption of power? "Look on this picture, and on that." We see an institution taking an attitude wholly unparalleled in the history of the country, and yet we have heard it draw down from gentlemen no denunciations. It had been repeatedly charged that the President was disposed to arrogate to himself monarchical power—to assume the imperial purple; and yet, when we look to the age of the man, to his habits, and to his character, we may well ask what object he can have in view for abusing the high trust reposed in him? On the contrary, he has every inducement not to tarnish that fame acquired by such distinguished services, and by a long life of patriotic devotion to the institutions of the country. Mr. B. concluded by saying, he had conceived it to be his duty to make these few remarks, in reply to what had fallen from the gentlemen from New Jersey and South Carolina.

Mr. FORSYTH said there was one remark that had fallen from the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PIERCE] to which he begged leave to call the attention of the Senate. It was the complaint made by that gentleman, that the Secretaries of State and the Treasury, and the Attorney General, were officers of the President of the United States, and not officers of the United States. He believed the constitution authorized the President, in the intermediate time between the meetings of Congress, to grant commissions to any officer of the Government, which were to endure to the termination of the next session of the Senate thereafter. The persons thus appointed were officers of the United States, and whether they were or were not sent to the Senate for confirmation, they still held their offices under the constitution. He did not understand what was the ground of complaint against the President for not having sent these appointments to the Senate. Was it his duty to do so? That he should suppose was left to the President's own discretion; and the right of the Senate was only to pass on appointments when sent to them. Could it be that there was an anxiety to have these nominations presented, in order to make still more embarrassing the relations between the President and the Senate? Were there not already enough causes of irritation, without seeking to increase them? The President in this matter had proceeded according to a just discretion, and he saw no reason for pressing the matter. When the nominations did come, it would be their duty to decide on them. Two honorable Senators had dwelt that morning on the strong evidences of public opinion presented by the memorial of the young men of Philadelphia—young men who are guided solely by generous sentiments. We have had here before a meeting of young men, a national convention of them, opposed to the present administration, and supporting an unsuccessful candidate for the Presidency—and what was the result? Why the young men of the convention were overshadowed by the young men of the other party at the ballot-box. It had been the misfortune of the city of Philadelphia, for the greater part of the last fifty years, to be opposed to the administration of the General Government, as well as to the politics of the State of Pennsylvania; and if at any time you wanted to know the sentiments of the people of that State, on political affairs, you had only to go to the city of Philadelphia, take the opinions of its inhabitants, and then the very reverse of them would be the opinions of the people of Pennsylvania.

It was said that Philadelphia could not be bought up by the bank. Now he trusted and believed that neither Philadelphia nor any part of the Union could be bought by the bank; but people might be influenced by passion and prejudice, and, if so, who so likely to be influenced by passion as the young men whose memorial had been presented that morning. There were but two classes of persons in Philadelphia, those in favor of the bank and those opposed to it; and among the genteel classes, it was an almost certain exclusion from society to belong to the latter class. The women, whose influence in society was so powerful, were all crying out for the restoration of the deposites; and these young men must be lost to all feeling, if they were not influenced in some degree by the opinions of the softer sex.

The honorable gentleman had referred to another subject, and, according to his views, the country had seen other and more dangerous encroachments of power than those hitherto charged against the Executive. He spoke of armies marching through one State to attack another; and yet this circumstance had excited no emotion throughout the country or in Congress. And why? the people knew the object, and approved the act; and even the people of the very State (Alabama) where the troops were marched, did not complain of it. The honorable gentleman had spoken of the revolution in progress, which he said had already caused bloodshed. He presumed the gentleman referred to a recent occurrence in Philadelphia, where an individual, returning from a public meeting, had been severely beaten, and had since died of his wounds. Would the gentleman from South Carolina, without a knowledge of the attending circumstances—would he venture to say, that the individual who perished did not merit the blow? Why was it, that the death of this man had created no excitement, when such a circumstance, in England, would have been followed by an investigation in the British Parliament? Why, it was because it did not belong to the Government of the United States to take cognizance of such matters—it belonged to the State of Pennsylvania only to take cognizance of a violation of the laws of that State; and justice would undoubtedly be done, either by the punishment of the guilty, or an acquittal of the innocent. Let him tell the Senator from South Carolina, that it did not belong to the opinions which he and himself, as friends of State rights, entertained, to intrust the administration of the laws of the States to the General Government. Really, one would imagine, from the constant repetition of distress and ruin, that the people themselves were deluded into the belief, that something worse than war, pestilence, and famine, had befallen them. Could not the people of Philadelphia look around them, and see the surest indications of a most unexampled state of prosperity; and, with these evidences before them, could they be deluded into the belief, that severe and pressing distress does really exist among them? He had seen the city of Philadelphia, when it was indeed suffering under the most agonizing distress—the city was desolate; he had passed through whole squares, without meeting a single human being; the sound of his own footsteps was frightful to him. Was the present state of things in Philadelphia like to that, when the pestilence raged there? On the contrary, they had every reason to be thankful for the blessings they enjoy. It was true, there was some considerable excitement prevailing, but this would not produce any evil consequences, if, through the means of gentlemen here, it did not extend to all parts of the country. He agreed with gentlemen, that it was not the bank only, that had produced all this excitement. There were other causes which had a powerful effect. These were political; which, although once dead, were now revived, and the bank was to be the instrument by which they were to be continued in being. Gentlemen were mistaken in supposing that the memorials, daily coming to the Senate, were evidences of public opinion. The offices of Government contained bushel baskets full of memorials, on the subject of the old Bank of the United States; and even in his own time, he had seen at most an equal number of resolutions and proceedings, on the question of the independence of the Cherokees.

A gentleman had just reminded him of the number of memorials on the tariff question; indeed there was no great question in which an excitement could not be got up, when the object was to gain political power by it. There was again the Missouri question, which had created its full share of excitement. In short, these memorials were no more to be considered as evidences of public sentiment than were the gambols of a parcel of puffing porpoises to be compared to the great leviathan of the deep, in whose wake they follow.

Mr. PRESTON said he would make a remark upon what had fallen from the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. BROWN.] He sees in the memorial of these young men, said Mr. P., the power of the bank—that dangerous influence which he has so often deprecated, and which he thinks is conspicuously manifested in this movement of the youth of Philadelphia. I think, said Mr. P., the gentleman's mind is so pre-occupied with the dangers of the bank, that he has not considered, with sufficient attention, the character of that influence which it is likely to exert. If it exert any improper influence—if it has any control beyond that which arises from a cold conviction of its usefulness as a moneyed institution, such influence and control must act upon the more sordid feelings of our nature, and must bring to its support that portion of society which expects individual gain from its existence, or fears private loss from its extinction. There is nothing in it to excite the imagination or enlist the feelings. It may govern the sordid; it cannot buy the generous. It may mingle its interests with the cares and anxieties of the money-making classes; but how can it address itself to the young, the ardent, the generous? They are more naturally influenced by those objects which strike the imagination, and belong to enthusiasm—by love of country—by devotion to liberty—by gratitude to statesmen and heroes—by admiration of military glory. The bosoms of these young men would be fired at the mention of Orleans. It is easier and more grateful, and more natural, to extol the glories of that gallant battle, than to defend the rights of a cold and heartless corporation, or to vindicate the law which has been violated in regard to it. And when gentlemen talk of the influence of the bank in Philadelphia, let them remember, that in despite of the President's early and persevering hostility to the bank, of which they boast so much—in despite of his imputed hostility to the tariff—in despite of his opposition to internal improvements—in despite of his enmity, as his friends now assert, to all the principles of Pennsylvania, such was the magic of his name, that that city declared in his favor. Where was the bank power then? And now that it is crippled and approaching its end, gentlemen say that it is the bank power which is destroying the power of Andrew Jackson; that it is the power of the bank that is rousing the people from Maine to Louisiana; that it is the power of the bank which has lashed the public mind in Philadelphia, and in the mountains of North Carolina, into this tempest of emotion; that it is the power of the bank that has kindled the indignation of the people against their rulers. No, sir, no. Gentlemen who think so have not sufficiently studied the springs of human feeling, and do not understand the people of this country. Their sympathies are not purchased for money; their passions are not roused by the touch of gold. The bank cannot buy over hearts. There may be, there are, mercenaries who may be bought by the bank, or by the Executive; but the young men of our country are not marketable. Mine and the honorable gentleman's constituents are far removed from and above all bank influence. No, sir; not for the bank—not for the bank, if its influence were quadrupled—not for the bank, if it were crushed into atoms. The gentleman is mistaken; another chord has been struck—a chord which is entwined in all our hearts, and vibrates with a deep and universal sympathy throughout our whole country. We feel no influence of the bank; it does not reach us—we don't know it; and where do the people stand up with more opposition to those measures of the administration than the people of the South. Let me not be told, then, of this all-pervading influence of the bank, upon which gentlemen are so willing to lay all the cries of the times. They are mistaken, utterly and entirely mistaken.

The honorable Senator from North Carolina, in alluding to what I had said concerning the mission to England, dropped a remark of much import. I complained that we had had no minister to England for two years, notwithstanding our intimate and important relations with that country, and notwithstanding the President had officially announced that delicate and difficult negotiations were in progress with that Government. To this the Senator replied, that nominations of ministers to England had not always been confirmed. This remark, said Mr. P., indicates the feeling and policy of certain politicians. Sir, the nomination was not confirmed, whether wisely or unwisely, he would not now consider; but does that authorize the President to keep the mission open for years? Is the country to be punished because the Senate thinks proper to exercise its undoubted constitutional function of rejecting a nominee? Are we to be told, that, if we do not implicitly bow with submission to the first indication of Executive will, our foreign relations shall be neglected? That, if we do not take the first nomination, none other shall be made?

[Mr. Brown explained.]

Mr. P. resumed. The gentleman did not assert this state of things, but his remark implied it. If the rejection, two years since, is the reason why there is no minister now in England, it is the reason why the President has made no new nomination. He has then refused, for two years, to make a nomination, because his nominee was rejected. He refuses to exercise his constitutional power—he refuses to perform his constitutional duty—he refuses to attend to the foreign relations of the country, because the Senate has not thought proper, in a single instance, to be the passive instrument of his will. This non-exercise of power which the constitution has confided to him, is but little less dangerous than his assumption of power which the constitution has withheld from him. He keeps open all the high offices of the Government, or fills them at his pleasure, with an entire disregard of the concurrent rights of this body. He fills the great departments at home without consulting the Senate, and keeps foreign missions open for hungry and subservient expectants.

The Senate is superseded—designedly, deliberately, systematically superseded, because it dares to be what, in its creation, it was intended to be, a check upon the dangerous power of the Chief Magistrate. He will not trust the Senate with his nominations to foreign courts, and therefore the missions are not filled. He will not trust the Senate with his nominations to the high offices at home, and he fills them by his own will. In some instances, after his favorites have been rejected by the Senate, he has continued them in office, and nominated them over and over again. For what practical purpose does this body exist? The President has annihilated us. Sir, there is nothing left us but to protest against these usurpations. The liberty of occupying these seats, and of speech, is yet a while graciously permitted to us.

Let me add, said Mr. P., to the catalogue of extraordinary events that characterize these times, a fact in regard to the public debt. The 4½ per cent. stock was redeemable on the 1st of January, but could not be paid but after six months' previous notice. An abundance of money was in the Treasury for its discharge; but so deeply interested was the administration in the hurly-burly of its attack upon the bank; so engrossed in the removal of the deposits, that the notice was forgotten, the debt was not discharged, the Government continued to pay interest, and kept its money idle in an overflowing Treasury.

These, said Mr. P., are specimens of the conduct of this administration.

The memorials, as moved, were then referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

REMOVAL OF THE DEPOSITES.

The CHAIR having called the special order, being the resolutions offered by Mr. CLAY, and the report of the Committee on Finance—

Mr. FORSYTH said he would, with the permission of the gentleman who was entitled to the floor, correct a misrepresentation of his remarks yesterday, so great that he was led to apprehend that it was designed to do him or another person injury. The Senator from Kentucky, introducing his resolution of inquiry into the amount of the public money on deposit in the Union Bank of Maryland, had said "he hoped it would turn out that the Secretary of the Treasury was not a stockholder in this bank to any extent which could authorize an impression that he had suffered his own interests to enter into the considerations which led him to select this bank as one of the depositories of the public money." Without then knowing, as he now did, that the amount of stock owned by Mr. Taney was small, Mr. F. rose to protest against the sentiment expressed, and to appeal to the justice and generous feelings of the Senator from Kentucky, that no amount of stock owned by Mr. Taney could justify an inference to his prejudice—that his character was a sufficient guarantee that his official acts could not be influenced by his pecuniary interests. Now, Mr. F. said, he was represented in the National Intelligencer, as endorsing the Senator's remark; he was made to say—"he did not imagine, however, that it would be found, on examination, that the Secretary held sufficient stock to render it an object with him to select this bank for the custody of any part of the public money;" thus admitting what he had risen to deny, that there was an amount of stock, which, if owned in the bank by Mr. Taney, could, by possibility, govern his official conduct.

Mr. WRIGHT then rose, and addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. W. said he rose with unfeigned reluctance to address the Senate; that the debate had been so long protracted, and had been so full and able upon all the points involved in the discussion, that he felt fully conscious he could give no light, and add no interest, to what had been already advanced. He would have declined troubling the Senate at all, at this late stage of the debate, were it not that he considered the first resolution as particularly exceptionable in every sense in which he had been able to view it. He had, at an early period of the debate, intended to offer his views at large upon the whole subject, and he had made some propositions to fulfil that intention; but the progress of the discussion had induced him to abandon position after position, which it had been his purpose to occupy, in consequence of the full and able views given of them by others, until he had brought himself to the conclusion to confine his remarks wholly to the first of the resolutions offered by the Senator from Kentucky. He had come to this conclusion definitively, after the very able argument of his honorable colleague, recently made to the Senate, upon all the grounds covered by the second resolution, and generally embracing all the reasons of the Secretary of the Treasury. He could add nothing to that argument, and any attempt, on his part, to do so, would be more likely to weaken the positions which had been so well defended, than to secure the defences, already, in his judgment, sufficiently impregnable. Mr. W.

[SENATE.]

also said he did not expect to advance any thing in relation to the first resolution, which had not before, in the course of the debate, been suggested; but he did hope to offer a more detailed and connected argument upon that single point, than had been offered by those who had preceded him, and who had embraced the whole scope of the special order. He owed it to himself, however, as well as to the Senate, to say that it was his intention to confine himself to a strict legal argument, of the most dry and uninteresting character, and that he could neither expect, nor ask, that attention which he might hope, were the subject less exhausted, and the topics less technical.

The resolution, he said, was in the following words:

"Resolved, That, by dismissing the late Secretary of the Treasury, because he would not, contrary to his sense of his own duty, remove the money of the United States in deposit with the Bank of the United States and its branches, in conformity with the President's opinion, and by appointing his successor to effect such removal, which has been done, the President has assumed the exercise of a power over the Treasury of the United States, not granted to him by the constitution and laws, and dangerous to the liberties of the people."

This, said Mr. W., is the resolution, and I consider it, in the broadest sense, judicial, as far as the action of the Senate upon it is concerned. I, therefore, preliminarily, lay down the following proposition, which I believe I shall be able to sustain, not only from the language and import of the resolution itself, but from an examination of the grounds upon which its friends seek to justify that action by this body. My proposition is, that the resolution contains matter of impeachment, and matter of impeachment only, and, therefore, that it is unconstitutional for the Senate to act upon it, other than judicially, and upon an impeachment sent up from the House of Representatives.

Article 1, section 2, clause 5, of the constitution of the United States, reads as follows:

"The House of Representatives shall choose their Speaker and other officers, and shall have the sole power of impeachment."

Section 3, clause 6, of the same article, says:

"The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments."

Here, then, sir, are the constitutional divisions of power between the two branches of Congress, as to impeachments. Does the resolution under consideration contain impeachable matter, so as to call upon these powers to enable us properly to act upon it?

It charges that "the President has assumed the exercise of a power over the Treasury of the United States, not granted to him by the constitution and laws, and dangerous to the liberties of the people." And that he has "assumed the exercise of that power," "by dismissing the late Secretary of the Treasury, because he would not, contrary to his sense of his own duty, remove the money of the United States in deposit with the Bank of the United States and its branches, in conformity with the President's opinion; and by appointing his successor to effect such removal, which has been done."

The first of these charges, if well made, must be a high crime. An assumption of a power over the public Treasury, not granted by the constitution and laws, and dangerous to the liberties of the people, can surely be nothing less.

The second, to wit, the removal of a Secretary of the Treasury for an insufficient cause, and under the influence of an improper motive, viz. to acquire a power over the public Treasury, "not granted by the constitution and laws, and dangerous to the liberties of the people," if sustained as charged, cannot be less than a high misdemeanor.

Article 2, section 4, of the constitution, says:

"The President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors."

The advocates for the resolution do not deny that it contains impeachable matter, but they justify the action of the Senate, as they say, "legislatively," upon it.

The honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] says, "the Senate ought to act upon the resolution to protect its legislative powers."

It is not pretended that the legislative powers of the Senate have been assailed. The resolution does not assume to recite an act of infringement upon the legislative powers of the Senate. It assumes Executive encroachments, and Executive encroachments only, and proceeds at once to pronounce judgment upon them. It proposes no legislative act, nor does it assert any legislative power. If, then, the Senate have the right to protect its legislative powers, as it no doubt has, this resolution neither asserts the right contended for, nor mentions the violation against which protection is required, nor does it propose any sort of protection. It does not, therefore, come, in any sense, within this principle of the Senator, and the action of the Senate upon it finds no justification in his remark. I pass to the Senator's second ground:

"The Senate may properly act upon the resolution, because the President may perform an unconstitutional act without the quo animo, the intention to violate the constitution."

It is impossible to consider this position in connexion with the objection to which it is intended to be an answer, without taking it as an admission that the action of the Senate upon this resolution is judicial. The quo animo of the President, or of any other officer of the Government, as to any act performed by them bearing upon their constitutional powers, cannot possibly be material to the Senate in its legislative character. If legislation should be required, growing out of any such act, it would be legislation to provide a remedy for the wrong committed, or to prevent a repetition of the act, and, in either case, the quo animo of the officer performing the act complained of, could not be material. The wrong would not be less, or the remedy different, whether the action should proceed from design or ignorance. If, therefore, the determination of the existence or not of the quo animo, in the acts recited in the resolution, be material to the question whether the Senate can, or cannot, properly act upon it legislatively, that fact proves the resolution to be judicial, until that point shall be judicially decided. And as no object of legislation is either proposed or to be accomplished by the passage of the resolution, any action of the Senate upon it, going to decide this preliminary question of the quo animo, is clearly a judicial action, and therefore an assumption of power, in violation of the constitutional powers of the body.

The position concedes that if the quo animo be assumed, the question would be judicial, while the resolution, the quo animo, being added, would, according to a further admission by the ground taken, be not only an impeachment, but a judgment of condemnation upon the charges made. It follows then, irresistibly, that the action of the Senate legislatively, would be a judgment of acquittal as to the quo animo, and that judgment is as much judicial as a judgment of condemnation could be. Again, therefore, I repeat, that the Senate cannot act upon this resolution constitutionally, in any other than its capacity of the high trust for the trial of impeachments. The Senator says, thirdly—

"The Senate may act upon the resolution, because the President may not be impeached, even if the act and the quo animo are both found against him."

Here we meet a most singular reason for action. The court will condemn the accused, because the grand jury may not find a bill against him: the Senate of the United States will convict the President of the United States of a flagrant violation of the constitution of the United States, because the House of Representatives, those who hold in their hands the voice of the people of the country, may not impeach him. But again, the fourth reason for action is still more singular.

The action of the Senate is proper, "because a call upon the Senate to act judicially in this instance, depends upon a contingency which no one now expects will happen."

This throws the last proposition into the shade. Here the sentence of condemnation is to be pronounced, because no one expects the grand inquest will even indict. The Senate of the United States are to convict the President of the United States of a flagrant violation of the constitution, because "no one expects" the House of Representatives will impeach him. Strange cause indeed for performing judicial duties in a legislative character.

The Senator has told us of the "bleeding constitution of his country;" and is this the way in which the wounds of that instrument are to be healed? Is an alleged violation of the constitution by the Executive to be cured by a palpable violation of that instrument by the Senate? Will the Senate sanction such reasons for acting upon such a resolution?

But the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SOUTHARD] sanctions the same idea by the following language:

"It is objected to the first resolution, that the Senate ought not to act upon it, because this body may be called upon to act upon the same matter, brought before it in the shape of an impeachment. An impeachment of whom?" says the Senator; "an impeachment of Andrew Jackson? an impeachment of Roger B. Taney? Look at the history of the country. Did any one ever hear of the impeachment of those who stand in an overwhelming majority? No, sir. Such persons have a shield impervious to the Senate."

Here we have the principle fully developed. The Senate is to proceed to judgment of condemnation against the President, because the representatives of the people will not impeach him; and the representatives of the people will not impeach him, because an "overwhelming majority" of the people themselves, whom they represent, are in favor of the President, and approve his conduct. If any cause can be more sure than another, to render the Senate odious to the people of this country, it will be attempts here to assume the duties of the immediate representatives of the people; to constitute ourselves the accusers as well as the judges; and, having done this, to resist the known and expressed will of the people, by bringing down upon the head of some too popular public servant the tremendous judicial sentence of this body, without the form of a trial, or even the exhibition of a constitutional accusation.

Do these sentiments come from men who have been raised high in the honors of the republic? Who have themselves been counsellors of a former President? And at a time, too, when a majority of this body, holding this judicial power over their acts, was politically opposed to the administration with which they were thus connected? If so, I venture the assertion that they never found that majority attempting thus to condemn them, or their principal, without a trial; and I further venture to say, that that majority, so acting, were sustained by the people.

I assume, in the second place, that the resolution, if such as the Senate could properly entertain, is irrelevant to the subject before this body, and in relation to which it purports to have been introduced, and, therefore, should not be entertained. The special order before the Senate is the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, assigning his reasons for the change of the deposits of the public moneys of the United States from the Bank of the United States. It has no reference whatever to the President, the late Secretary of the Treasury, his appointment or removal, or to the appointment of the present Secretary. It relates solely to a single official act of his own, the change of the deposits; and merely assigns, in obedience to an express requirement of law, his reasons for that act. It says nothing of his predecessor in office, of what he would or would not do, or what was or was not his sense of duty. It makes no allusion to him whatever. Where, then, is the relevancy of this resolution to this special order?

I next assume that the resolution, if within the constitutional jurisdiction of the Senate, and relevant to the subject of the special order, is erroneous in both of its conclusions, and in the fact assumed, upon which the conclusions depend. The fact stated, is, that the President "assumed the exercise of a power over the Treasury of the United States," and the sense in which the charge is made is learned from the language of the advocates of the resolution. The President is said to have taken possession of the public money; to have opened the public Treasury, and taken therefrom its contents; to have united the sword and the purse of the country in the same hand; to have robbed the Treasury, and taken into his own keeping the money of the people. Now, said Mr. W., in this sense, I affirm that the President has exercised no power whatever over the Treasury of the United States. What acts are mentioned as constituting this charge?

The resolution recites that the President removed from office the late Secretary of the Treasury.

One of the earliest debates in the first Congress convened under the present constitution of the United States, was upon the question of the power of the President to remove from office, according to the provisions of that constitution. The question was decided by that Congress in favor of the power, as a part of "the executive power" vested in the President by that instrument; and the whole practice of the Government, and of every President, from Washington to the present incumbent of that high office, has been in conformity with that decision. The power was decided to exist, and to be derived from the constitution itself.

It is particularly worthy of remark, that the power to remove the Secretary of the Treasury occupied a conspicuous place in the debate, and furnished a very considerable portion of the argument of the speakers upon both sides of the question. The decision, therefore, was made after full argument as to the power to remove this very officer. The President, then, in the removal of the late Secretary of the Treasury, did not "assume the exercise of a power not granted to him by the constitution and the laws." But a removal of the Secretary of the Treasury does not enable the President to gain access to the Treasury of the United States. There is a Treasurer, appointed by the President and Senate, who keeps the keys of the public Treasury. Were the President, therefore, to remove the Secretary, he would meet the Treasurer, and must dispose of him before he could reach the public Treasury. This officer is removable by the President, but he has not removed him, which fact, of itself, repels the idea that he has attempted to "assume the exercise of a power over the public Treasury."

Here might be rested the proof of the falsity of the fact stated in the resolution, that the President "assumed the exercise of a power over the public Treasury;" but it shall be carried one step further. It is not even contended that one cent of money was taken from the public Treasury between the time of the removal of the late Secretary of the Treasury, and the appointment of the present incumbent of that office, nor is it contended that any change of the deposits of money standing to the credit of the Treasurer, or any other change or order affecting the public Treasury, was made during that interval. The advocates for the resolution, then, admit that the power exercised over the public Treasury, by the President, was not so exercised during the vacancy created in that office by the removal of the late Secretary.

The resolution further recites, that the President appointed the present Secretary in the place of the late Secretary removed.

The constitution says, "The President shall have power to fill any vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions, which shall expire at the end of their next session."

The President, then, had power to appoint a Secretary of the Treasury in the place of the late Secretary removed, and in this act he did not "assume the exercise of a power not granted to him by the constitution and laws."

When, then, has the President, "assumed the exercise of a power over the Treasury of the United States not granted to him by the constitution and laws?" It has not been contended that, since the appointment of the new Secretary, any money has been drawn from the public Treasury but by his direction. His report before the Senate shows that the deposits were changed by his order, and gives to Congress his reasons for the act; though it should be borne constantly in mind, that the change of the deposits took not one dollar from the Treasury.

It was, said Mr. W., if I may be allowed the expression, the mere change of the location of the chest, of the strong box; it was not the use of the Treasurer's key; it was not taking anything from the Treasury, or subtracting any thing from the amount for which he stood chargeable to the country. The power was exercised over the place for keeping the Treasury, not over the money itself.

The foregoing remarks seem to establish conclusively the following propositions:

That the President "assumed the exercise of a power" over the late Secretary of the Treasury, by removing him from office, as he had a constitutional right to do.

That he "assumed the exercise of a power," granted to him in terms by the constitution, to appoint, "during the recess of the Senate," the present Secretary, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the removal of the late Secretary.

That he has not "assumed the exercise of a power over the Treasury of the United States," or over the Treasurer of the United States, of any description whatsoever.

That he has not "assumed the exercise" of any power, in reference to the subject of the resolution, "not granted to him by the constitution and laws."

I might here safely rest my argument upon this first resolution, merely drawing from the foregoing propositions the natural corollary, that, as the President has only "assumed the exercise" of powers expressly granted by the constitution, he has not "assumed the exercise" of any power "dangerous to the liberties of the people," unless the powers granted to him by the constitution of the United States, and exercised by all the Presidents of the United States, from the commencement of the Government under the constitution to the present time, are "dangerous to the liberties of the people." But I feel bound, from a sense of respect to the gentlemen who advocate the resolution, as well as from a disposition to place this whole subject in a clear light before my constituents and the country, to notice the positions taken upon the other side, from which the inference in the resolution is drawn that the President, in changing his Secretary, has "assumed the exercise of a power not granted to him by the constitution and laws."

Neither of the gentlemen [Messrs. CLAY and SOUTHARD] has been understood as denying the constitutional power of the President to remove a Secretary of the Treasury, but the attempt seems to be to prove that the removal of the late Secretary was made under circumstances to which the power of removal does not extend. What are the circumstances upon which the gentlemen rely to take this case of the general power of removal conferred upon the President? I take their own statements.

There is a law of Congress incorporating the stockholders to the Bank of the United States. That law directs the deposit of the public moneys of the United States with that bank; but gives to the Secretary of the Treasury the power to change that deposit.

The President thought the late Secretary ought to exercise that power, and divert the public moneys from the bank. The Secretary thought that he ought not to exercise the power, and refused to do so. The President considered the execution of the law important to the country, and removed the Secretary who refused to execute it. Here we meet with what has been harshly termed "the act of persecution, usurpation, tyranny, a most flagrant violation of the constitution and the laws of the land, an assumption of the exercise of power not granted to him" (the President) "by the constitution and laws and dangerous to the liberties of the people."

I propose to look at this state of facts, at the constitution and the law, and then to test the applicability of these strong denunciations against the President of the United States, made in the Senate of the United States.

The positions assumed to justify the conclusions in favor of the resolution and against the President, are—

First. That the removal was made because the late Secretary refused to do an act "contrary to his sense of his own duty." In other words, it is called "an act of persecution for opinion's sake."

What practical meaning has this position? Was ever an officer removed where the cause of removal did not exist in a difference of opinion between the power of removal and the agent to be removed? where the agent, or officer did not refuse to do an act which the removing power thought he ought to do? or insist upon doing an act which the removing power thought he ought not to do?

I answer, there is but one possible case in which a removal can take place, without a cause, in one shape or another, growing out of these differences of opinion between the removing and the removed officer; and, as that case must be utter incompetency, I congratulate the advocates of the resolution upon the fact that they are not compelled, in reference to the late Secretary, whom they so warmly eulogize, and towards whom their sympathies are so kindly extended, to resort to this cause alone for his removal; but are able to show that a difference of opinion between him and the President furnishes a probable ground for his loss of office. Removal "for opinion's sake" then, is nothing more, or less, than a removal growing out of a difference of opinion between the removing power and the officer to be removed. The power to remove is admitted; but the power to remove on account of a difference of opinion between the removing officer and the officer to be removed, is denied. What is the practical effect of this construction of the power of removal conferred by the constitution upon the President? It is, that he may remove those who agree with him in opinion; those who are willing and desirous to aid his measures and give efficiency to his administration; those with whom he can live and act in harmony; his political and personal friends; but that he cannot remove those who differ with him in opinion; those who will not carry into effect the measures of his administration; those who are personally and politically hostile to him. I shall presently examine this power, and see if its proper construction leads to such absurdities.

Second. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] lays down the distinct proposition, that "the Secretary of the

SENATE.]

Removal of the Deposites.

[MARCH 26, 1834.]

Treasury is not an executive officer, nor is the Treasury Department an executive department."

A sufficient answer, in legal argument, to this proposition is, that the power of removal, conferred upon the President by the constitution, extends to the removal of the Secretary of the Treasury, whether he be or be not an executive officer, and whether his Department be or be not an executive department; and this the advocates of the resolution admit. The whole proposition, therefore, in its application here, goes merely to question the sufficiency of the cause of the removal, and not to deny the constitutional or legal power. It stands, then, with the proposition just examined, in this respect, and will be further replied to when the power of removal shall be examined. I cannot, however, be understood as admitting the facts assumed by this proposition, "that the Secretary of the Treasury is not an executive officer," and that "his Department is not an executive department." I will not, however, enter, in detail, into the proofs which show that the position, in every sense, is mistaken in fact, as others have already fully done this, but will content myself with taking a very brief view of the proposition, as compared with the provisions of the constitution alone, wholly without reference to the laws establishing and regulating the Department.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] read from the President's communication to his cabinet as follows:

"Upon him (the President) has been devolved by the constitution and the suffrages of the American people, the duty of superintending the operations of the executive departments of the Government, and seeing that the laws are faithfully executed."

When he says, "This I deny! The constitution does not devolve these duties upon the President. The laws organizing the executive departments, except the Treasury Department, put these departments under the direction of the President; but it is the law, not the constitution, from which he derives his authority."

We will see what the constitution does confer upon the President in relation to the executive departments. It reads as follows:

"The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America."

Now, as I cannot yield to the force of the comment of the learned Senator, in another part of his argument, that the provision in the bank charter "that the business of the institution should be conducted by a board of directors" was not saying "that all business" should be so conducted, I must be permitted to believe that the constitution, when it says, "The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America," means that all the executive power, not otherwise expressly granted, shall be so vested, and not that a part of it only should pass by that grant, and that the residue should be conferred by Congress, to which body, as a Congress, that instrument gives no executive power. The only grant of executive power to be found in the constitution, other than that above quoted, is the grant to the Senate in relation to appointments to office, and as this last grant is defined and specific, it certainly cannot extend to an executive supervision over the executive departments.

If, then, the Treasury Department be an executive department, the constitution has devolved upon the President the duty of superintending its operations, as it has "vested" in him all the "executive power" of the Government, except the specific grant to the Senate relating exclusively to appointments.

Is the Treasury Department an executive department? The duties of it are executive. The head of it is appointed as the executive officers are; is made one of the constitutional advisers of the Executive; a member of his confidential cabinet; and is bound to give his opinion, when called for, in any matter relating to the executive Government—the characteristics of the department, therefore, are purely executive. But, if not executive, to which of the other great departments does it belong? The constitution has created another, called the legislative department. The following is the provision:

"All legislative powers herein granted, shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives."

Surely, the Treasury Department can find no place under this grant. Its duties are, in no respect, legislative. The Secretary does not receive his appointment from the people, the States, or the legislature, and he is removable at the pleasure of the President, but not otherwise, except upon an impeachment by the House Representatives, and a judgment of condemnation by the Senate. The legislature cannot remove him. The constitution has created a third great department of the Government, called the judicial department. The following is the provision:

"The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish."

The Treasury Department surely is, in no judicial sense, a court, and cannot, therefore, be a judicial department.

From the constitution itself, then, it appears that the Treasury Department is an executive department, and cannot belong to either of the other great departments into which that instrument has divided all the powers of the Government of the United States; that Congress has not the power, by the constitution, to establish a similar department, and divest it of the executive character given to all these departments by the constitutional disposition of the Government powers; that the constitution has vested in the President of the United States "the executive power," and by virtue of that grant of power, has devolved upon him "the duty of superintending the operations of the executive departments of the Government."

I am discharged, therefore, from all necessity of an examination of the laws relative to this Department, as they surely will be so construed as to make them conform to the constitution, unless provisions shall be found wholly irreconcilable to it, and no such provisions have been pointed out.

What, then, is this supervisory power of the President over the executive departments?

The constitution answers in the following language:

"He [the President] shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed."

In what manner is he to do this? The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] contends this clause of the constitution only means "that if resistance to the laws be made, the President shall see that such resistance be overcome." The Senator considers the power as intimately connected with the power to call out the militia to enforce the laws, and as going no farther than to oppose and overcome resistance offered against the execution of a law. This would confound this most important duty of the President with his powers and duties arising under the various laws which have been passed "to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions," powers and duties strictly military, and derived by the President, not from the constitution, but from laws of Congress passed in pursuance of the power given to that body by the provision of the constitution above recited.

With proper submission to the views of the honorable Senator, I think it most clear that the power in question is wholly of a civil character, and that the duty imposed pertains exclusively to the executive powers of the President. It enjoins upon him constant vigilance over all the civil affairs of the Government. "He shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed." It may be inquired, Suppose he meets with a refusal on the part of the officer to do his duties and execute the laws, how is he to enforce obedience? I answer, not by calling out the militia upon the officer, but by promptly removing him from his office, where that power is in his hands, and, where it is not, by laying the facts before the House of Representatives, to the end that an impeachment may remove him. It is unquestionably for this purpose that the wisdom of the convention vested "the executive power" in the President; and this apparent necessity which induced the decision, by the first Congress under the constitution, that the power of removal from office was a part of the executive power, and was in the hands of the Executive.

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr SOUTHWARD] was understood to contend that the cause of the removal, operating upon the mind of the President to induce the act, was material to the constitutionality or unconstitutionality, legality or illegality, of the act of removal. Indeed, I am unable to discover the force of this argument, as made by the Senator, and as applicable to the resolution, unless he intended to give it this direction. The resolution charges that the President has "assumed the exercise of a power" "not granted to him by the constitution and the laws;" and the Senator expressly admitted the power, in some cases, to remove, and denied it in the case recited in the resolution, upon the ground that the cause of the removal was insufficient to justify the act.

This brings me to an examination of this power of removal. Its existence in the President has not only been before shown, but is admitted, to some extent, by all the advocates of the resolution. What, then, is the extent of this power.

The power itself was decided, by the first Congress convened under the constitution, to exist in, and to be derived from, that instrument, as a necessary part of "the executive power" vested in the President. As such it has been exercised by every Executive under the constitution.

This instrument imposes no limitation whatever upon the power, other than the liability to impeachment for any abuse of that, as well as of any other power conferred upon the Executive, which shall amount to a high crime or misdemeanor. The cause of the act of removal, therefore, as the motive which, in the mind of the Executive, induces it, is not a constitutional limit upon the exercise of the power, but a mere test of the liability incurred in its exercise in any given case.

It follows, then, that if the President, so far as the constitution is concerned, has power to remove the officer for good cause, a removal of him for an insufficient cause, or from a bad motive, does not make the act unconstitutional; the cause and the motive having relation only to the liability of the Executive to an impeachment, and not to the validity of the act of removal.

It remains to inquire whether any law of Congress has restricted this power, or connected its exercise with the cause or motive which leads to it. The very remark shows what the answer must be, as the power, being derived solely from the constitution, and being unlimited by that instrument, any law which should impose limits would be unconstitutional. But without resting upon this answer, my research has not enabled me to find any such law; the advocates of the resolution have referred to no such law, and I believe I am safe in saying that no law has ever been passed, assuming to impose restrictions or limitations upon the executive power of removal from office of the Secretary of the Treasury. Any removal of that officer by the President, therefore, whether made in consequence of a difference of opinion between the officers, or from whatever cause—whether he be denominated an executive officer or be not—cannot be either unconstitutional or illegal.

As to the first resolution, then, I now come to the following conclusive and simple propositions:

The resolution charges the President with having "assumed the exercise of a power over the Treasury of the United States, not granted to him by the constitution and the laws, and dangerous to the liberties of the people."

The charge is based upon the assumed facts, that the late Secretary was removed from office "because he would not, contrary to his sense of his own duty, remove the money of the United States, in deposit with the Bank of the United States and its branches, in conformity with the President's opinion;" and that his successor, the present Secretary, was appointed "to effect such removal, which has been done."

The conclusions are—

That the President has, by the constitution, the power of removal of a Secretary of the Treasury, wholly without limitation, he being liable to an impeachment for a criminal exercise of the power.

That he has, by the constitution, the unlimited power to appoint, "during the recess of the Senate," a Secretary of the Treasury, whenever that office shall be vacant, he being also liable to impeachment for a criminal exercise of this power.

That neither the removal from office of a Secretary of the Treasury, nor the appointment of a successor to fill the vacancy, is an assumption of "the exercise of a power over the Treasury of the United States;" or if it is,

That it is "the exercise of a power over the Treasury of the United States" vested in the President by the constitution, as necessarily growing out of his unrestrained power of removal, and his equally unrestrained power "to fill any vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate."

Here I leave this first resolution, repeating that any action of the Senate upon it, other than in its judicial capacity, will be a flagrant violation of the constitution; that considered legislatively, it is wholly irrelevant to the subject before the Senate; that it is entirely erroneous in its assumptions of fact and conclusions of law; and that any acts of the President to which it alludes wholly fail to justify the harsh terms which have been applied to them by the advocates of the resolution.

But we are still called upon to vote upon this resolution; and who, Mr. President, is it, upon whom the sentence of this Senate is thus to be passed without a trial? The officer, sir, is none other than the chief executive officer of the Government—the President of the United States—he whom the people elevated to that high station by their free suffrages, against the popularity and power of a competitor holding the office, and wielding its patronage—a patronage now represented to be so immense, and irresistible, and dangerous—and wielding it, too, with the aid of skillful and experienced advisers. It is no other than that President, who, after four years of official trial before the people, was re-elected against another competitor, selected from among the distinguished of his countrymen for his superior hold upon the popular feeling of the country; and re-elected, too, by a vote more decisive than any which had ever before marked the result of a long and severe political contest. Such, Mr. President, is the officer, I had like to have said upon his trial. No, sir, it is not so—who is not to be allowed a trial, but who is about to receive the condemnatory sentence of the Senate, unheard.

Who, sir, is the man, the citizen of our republic, upon whom we are about to pronounce our high censures? Is it Andrew Jackson? Is it that Andrew Jackson who, in his boyhood, was found in the blood-stained fields of the Revolution?—who came out from that struggle the last living member of his family?—who, when the sound of arms again called our citizens around the flag of our country, posted himself upon the defenceless frontier of the South and West, and bared his own bosom to the tomahawks and scalping knives, sharpened for the blood of unprotected women and children?—who turned back from the city of the West the confident advance of the ruthless, and, until then, unsubdued enemy, and closed that second war against American liberty in a blaze of glory, which time will not extinguish?—who, when peace was restored to his beloved country, turned his spear into a pruning hook, and retired to his hermitage, until the spontaneous voice of his fellow-citizens called him forth to receive their highest honors, and to become the guardian of their most sacred trust? Is this the man who is to be condemned without a trial?—who is not entitled to the privilege allowed him by the constitution of his country? Sir, this surely should not be so. For the very act which saved a city from pillage and destruction, and the soil of his country from the tread of an invading enemy, this individual was accused of a violation of the constitution and laws of his country. For the very act which entitled him to the proud appellation of “the greatest captain of the age,” he was convicted and condemned as a criminal. But, Mr. President, he was not then denied a trial. Then he was permitted to face his accusers, to hear the charges preferred against him, to offer his defence, and to be present at his sentence. In gratitude for these privileges of a freeman, he stayed back with his own arm the advancing of popular indignation, while he bowed his whitened locks to the sentence of the law, and paid the penalty imposed upon him for having saved and honored his country. Grant to him, I beseech you, Mr. President, I beseech the Senate, grant to that old man the privilege of a trial now. Condemn him not unheard, and without the presence of a constitutional accusation. His rivalships are ended. He asks no more of worldly honor. “He has done the state some service.” Age has crept upon him now, and he approaches the grave. Let him enjoy, during the short remainder of his stay upon earth, the rights secured to him by that constitution he has so often and so gallantly defended, and, if indeed he be criminal, let his conviction precede his sentence.

Mr. FORSYTH asked a division of the question.

Mr. CLAY then said, that he had waited for some time to see if any other gentleman desired to address the Senate on the subject. If not, he should say a few words; but, as he was not prepared at that late hour, he should propose an adjournment, with a view to close the discussion on this question to-morrow.

At the suggestion of Mr. POINDEXTER, the motion was withdrawn, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and, after remaining some time with closed doors,

The Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, MARCH 27.

AUGUSTA (GEORGIA) MEMORIAL.

Mr. KING, of Georgia, presented a memorial from about 400 citizens of Augusta, asking a restoration of the deposits, and a re-charter of the Bank of the United States.

Mr. K. said that as, from the proceedings of yesterday, he found it was still usual, on the presentation of memorials, to speak of the character of the memorialists, and, at the same time, to say something upon the subject of their complaints—although he disapproved the practice of discussing these memorials, and thought the compliments of respectability, &c., as mere formal ceremonies—yet, as the practice was continued, he could not consent that his fellow-citizens of Augusta, and their memorial, should suffer too much in comparison with those from various other quarters and sections of the Union, by refusing to bestow upon them something like the accustomed attention. He said, then, he could state that he was personally acquainted with a very large portion of the memorialists; and he thought that, to a limited extent, they embraced all classes, characters, trades, professions, and interests, in the community from which the memorial came. He said he also found that a very respectable portion of the merchants and business men of the city had signed the memorial, and from his acquaintance with some of them, he thought their experience and general intelligence, as merchants, qualified them as well to judge of these measures of state policy which would likely improve or injure their respective interests, as a like number of merchants taken promiscuously from any other Southern city in the Union.

Of the politics of the memorialists, however, Mr. K. said he could not say so much. He was not extensively acquainted with the political opinions and feelings of his neighbors. He did not know whether they were generally friendly, or opposed to the present administration. But, from the best information he could gain, the memorial was not originated, circulated, signed, or sent here, with any very marked reference to party distinctions upon this point. He might, perhaps, he said, make this exception. There was a very small, but at the same time a very respectable party in the city of Augusta, (known as the nullifying party,) who, with a consistency with their former opinions upon the subject of the United States Bank, (which, so far from censuring, he was much disposed to admire,) had generally, he believed, declined to put their signatures to the paper.

There was one characteristic, however, said Mr. K., by which he thought the memorial might be distinctly marked. So far as he was acquainted with the sentiments of the memorialists, they had been generally friendly to a United States bank. They thought such an institution a useful instrument in the commerce of the country, and an efficient aid to the Government in the administration of its finances. The character and objects of the memorial, he said, might, in fact, be gathered from the language employed in it, which had been appropriately selected, and showed an evident intention in the memorialists to state nothing but the truth; but, at the same time, to state that in such a way as to forward, as far as possible, the object they had in view. They spoke of “indications” of distress in the commercial community; of “evils which they witness,” and of still greater evils which they apprehend, &c. They nowhere pointedly state, said Mr. K., that they are themselves suffering under any very unusual pecuniary embarrassment or pressure in their money market. They could not so state, he said, as he apprehended such statement would have been contrary to the fact. The very mail, he said, which brought the memorial, brought the prices current, by which it appeared that local stocks, (always the thermometer of the money market, as they were not influenced by any foreign competition,) and, in fact, all vendible articles usually stated in the price current, maintained their prices, and indicated that all those who had the worth of money could procure money on the usual and customary terms. He referred, also, to the proceedings of the meeting, by which it was admitted, he believed, by the speakers on both sides, that the pressure had not then reached the city. If further evidence were wanting, he said he could state that he had conversed with two of the memorialists themselves, both highly respectable merchants, who had stated to him that the present season had not been marked by any unusual distress among the merchants. And, said Mr. K., if Senators should still be incredulous, I hold in my hand a letter from one of the committee who drafted the memorial itself, a line from which, he supposed, would conclusively settle this point. Among other things the writer states, "As yet, our money market is about as you left it."

Mr. K. said he was thus particular in dwelling on these facts, not only to show the true character of the memorial and its object, but to sustain his colleague in a declaration he had made a few weeks past, that at that time the city of Augusta was suffering no unusual distress. The truth of this statement had been questioned by some honorable Senators, and particularly the honorable Senator from Kentucky had laughed at his colleague for this supposed mistake. Mr. K. said the statement of his colleague was strictly true at the time it was made, and in fact, so continued, up to the date of the last accounts.

But, said Mr. K., it is true the memorialists apprehend distress, and he thought with some reason, if he understood well the present state of affairs in that city. This pressure has been almost periodical in the Southern cities for several years past, and may always be expected to a certain extent, when the article of cotton opens at a price much beyond that which it afterwards maintained. It is known, said Mr. K., that Northern exchange is principally furnished to Southern merchants by the purchase and shipment of cotton. These are the means by and through which the Southern merchant pays his Northern debts. And when the trade continues regular throughout the season, the supply is generally equal to, and sometimes beyond the demand, and the premium on Northern exchange is often a trifle and sometimes nothing. But, said he, the planters, after they have sold a portion of their crops at good prices, sell the remainder with extreme reluctance at prices very far below what they have previously obtained. Every man, he said, at all in the habit of attending to the operations of his own mind, would understand the policy by which the planter was governed in such a case. In fact, the planter was not only inclined, but enabled, during the present season, by a timely disposition of a large portion of his crop, at good prices, to hold on to the remainder, in expectation of an advance. Since the fall in the foreign market had produced a heavy decline in the home market, sales had almost ceased in Augusta, and for the last sixty or seventy days the planters had generally stored. The warehouses in Augusta, though numerous and spacious, were crowded to overflowing, very few preferring to sell at the current prices, but holding on with an obstinate confidence, hoping better might be obtained. This policy, said Mr. K., has cut off the most usual supply of Northern exchange, which had risen, since the 1st of January, from par to two per cent. premium; and even this rate, being beyond the usual exchange, a further advance would probably produce a run upon the banks for specie, in the remittance of which the merchants (when the remittances must go on as usual) would find a better account than in the purchase of exchange at these high rates. If, for these reasons, the merchants should commence drawing specie from the banks, the banks must stop their discounts and reduce their debts, by calling upon their customers; and thus would commence the pressure.

There was another cause, said Mr. K., which might add something to the demand for money in the Southern cities; and which, if he mistook not, had added to the apprehensions of some practical men in the city of his residence. There were many Northern houses which had Southern connexions and business friends; and it will be recollected, said Mr. K., that, when making a few remarks before the Senate a few weeks since, I stated that there was rather an unusual demand for capital in the Northern cities, without the usual facilities of supplying them. The money market has been easier at the South; and he believed he had understood (at least it was reasonable) that many Southern houses had exhausted their credit to raise remittances to aid their Northern friends. This might, if the facts were so, add something to the usual demand for Northern exchange, which, together, would make something more than an ordinary demand, which was met, in consequence of the policy of the planters, by a very inadequate and insufficient supply. Mr. K. said he hoped, however, that this apprehended pressure might yet be averted by a change of policy by the planters, or such rise in their produce as would induce them to part with their property.

I might be disposed, said Mr. K., under other circumstances, to say something in reference to the object of the memorialists, in a more methodical manner than I have heretofore done, but the proposed measure of the re-charter is more directly before the Senate by the introduction of a bill for that purpose; and I will therefore conclude, by moving that the memorial be read, printed, and referred to the Committee on Finance; hoping that the bill, when brought forward for discussion, will have that deliberate attention to which the importance of the measure proposed so justly entitles it.

The memorial was then read and referred.

RE-CHARTERING BANK UNITED STATES.

Mr. WEBSTER rose and said he would correct, or alter, a notice he gave on Tuesday evening. He wished now to say that he should call up the bill for continuing the bank for six years, on Monday, the 21st day of April. That time would allow the period of a month, from its introduction, for its consideration by the country; and at the expiration of that period he should ask the Senate to take up the subject and act upon it.

LEXINGTON MEMORIAL.

Mr. CLAY rose and said he was desirous of calling up the resolutions he had submitted some days ago, but as he did not perceive the gentleman from Georgia, who he was inclined to believe wished to make some observations on the subject, to be in his place, he would waive the motion, and take the present opportunity of presenting a memorial from the citizens of Lexington, and of the town and county of Fayette, Kentucky, on the subject so interesting to the people of the United States. This memorial was signed by upwards of 1,200 persons, embracing mechanics, manufacturers, farmers, merchants, and the great body of men of business of those places; it was signed by numbers of his friends and neighbors—by individuals, some of whom he had known for forty years. It was on the common topic which had so often and for so long a time engaged the attention of the Senate—the existing distress of the country. It was very true, that the memorialists did not speak of very great pressure in their portion of the country; they spoke of the approach of great distress, and expressed their apprehensions that it would continue to increase. They had their apprehensions excited by what they deemed an assault on the constitution and laws of the country. If there was any spot in the Union, likely to be exempt from the calamities that had afflicted the others, it would be the region about Lexington and its immediate neighborhood. No where, to no other country, has Providence been more bountiful in its gifts. A country so rich and fertile that it yielded in fair and good seasons from sixty to seventy bushels of corn to the acre. It was a most beautiful country—all the land in it, not in a state of cultivation, was in parks, (natural meadows,) filled with flocks and herds, fattening on its luxuriant grass. But in what country, in what climate, the most favored by Heaven, can happiness and prosperity exist against bad government, against misrule, and against rash and ill-advised experiments? On the mountain's top, in the mountain's cavern, in the remotest borders of the country, every where, every interest has been affected by the mistaken policy of the Executive. While he admitted that the solicitude of his neighbors and friends was excited in some degree by the embarrassments of the country, yet they felt a deeper solicitude for the restoration of the rightful authority of the constitution and the laws. It is this which excites their apprehensions, and creates all their alarm. He would not, at this time, enlarge farther on the subject of this memorial. He would only remark, that hemp, the great staple of the part of the country from whence the memorial came, had fallen twenty per cent. since he left home, and that Indian corn, another of its greatest staples, the most valuable of the fruits of the earth for the use of man, which the farmer converted into most of the articles of his consumption, furnishing him with food and raiment, had fallen to an equal extent. There were in that county six thousand fat bullocks now remaining unsold, when, long before this time last year, there was scarcely one to be purchased. They were not sold, because the butchers could not obtain from the banks the usual facilities in the way of discounts; they could not obtain funds in anticipation of their sales wherewith to purchase; and now $100,000 worth of this species of property remains on hand, which, if sold, would have been scattered through the country by the graziers, producing all the advantages to be derived from so large a circulation. Every farmer was too well aware of these facts one moment to doubt them. We are, said Mr. C., not a complaining people. We think not so much of distress. Give us our laws—guaranty to us our constitution—and we will be content with almost any form of government.

Mr. C. then asked that the memorial be read, printed with the signatures, and referred to the Committee on Finance; which motion was carried.

BEAVER (PA.) MEMORIAL.

Mr. WILKINS presented the proceedings and resolutions adopted at a meeting held by the citizens of the town and county of Beaver, in the State of Pennsylvania, which he said had been transmitted to him some days since, although he had hitherto had no opportunity of presenting them. The town at which this meeting was held, Mr. W. observed, was situated at the confluence of the Big Beaver river with the Ohio, and was the seat of justice of that county. The persons who adopted these resolutions, were chiefly agriculturists, although the county contained within its limits many growers of wool, and some of the finest seats for water-power in the Union, where there were extensive manufactories, heretofore in a prosperous condition. The people of this county were unquestionably amongst the most respectable in the State of Pennsylvania; and an inspection of the signatures would satisfy the Senate of the numbers who attended the meeting; and, in the language of the gentleman who enclosed him the proceedings, he would say, it was the largest and most respectable meeting ever held in the county. Having thus done justice to the respectability and intelligence of the meeting, he would express his regrets that he could not go further, and say that he coincided with them in opinion. But he could not. They spoke of distress existing in the country, which they ascribed to the removal of the public depositories from the Bank of the United States; they were in favor of a restoration of the depositories, and a re-charter of the bank, with certain modifications. They also disapproved of the late message of the Chief Magistrate of Pennsylvania, in relation to the finances of the State, with the proceedings of their legislature, while they spoke in terms of high commendation of what they were pleased to term the independent and patriotic conduct of Mr. Duane, the late Secretary of the Treasury. And, lastly, they gave to his worthy colleague and himself some raps over the knuckles for their recent course in the Senate. Notwithstanding all this, it gave him pleasure to present their resolutions, and to bear testimony to their standing and respectability. Mr. W. then moved that the proceedings be referred to the Committee on Finance, and printed; which motion was carried.

REMOVAL OF THE DEPOSITES.

The CHAIR then announced the special order, being the resolutions offered by Mr. CLAY, and the report of the Committee on Finance; when

Mr. CLAY rose and said, it was just three months yesterday, since he opened the debate in the Senate, which was now drawing to a close. The period which had elapsed was long enough for a vessel to have passed the Cape of Good Hope, or to have made a return voyage from Europe. It was the longest period which had been occupied in a single debate in either House of Congress since the organization of the Government. But when the magnitude of the interests involved was considered, there was no disproportion between the time and the subject. He seriously believed the liberties of the country were involved in the measure under consideration, arising out of the acts of the Executive of the Government. The present situation of the country was truly alarming. Would nothing open the eyes of those in power? Would nothing soften their hearts? Between the commotions which followed the downfall of the first Bank of the United States and the present state of things, there was no comparison. Why was this whole people agitated from one extreme of this great nation to the other? Nature was still unchanged in her various operations. Why was it then? It had flown from the act of one man alone, honest and patriotic if you please, but still it had proceeded from that act. Gentlemen deceived themselves as to the evidence of public sentiment, as manifested by the late elections. Except the elections of the Senator on his right, [Mr. LEROY,] and another of a doubtful character in Virginia, there had been no demonstrations of public sentiment. It had been intimated that we should not adjourn until relief was effected; he would be willing to stay here until new year's day, if that would procure relief, but he saw no relief until public sentiment effected it. And he would be willing to say, when the authority of the constitution and laws should be vindicated, Let us adjourn, and go home, and consult our constituents, what was to be done for their relief, and then return and do their will. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WARREN] considered the first resolution as judicial in its character; that the President was under trial; and if it were so, he could not have had a more eloquent or able defender than the gentleman had been. Mr. C. denied having any personal feelings to gratify against the President; his feelings were exclusively public. He contended that the resolution was not judicial, either in its form or purposes; that it was next to impossible to bring the President to trial upon an impeachment, if that were designed. That upon the doctrine contended for by gentlemen, if the Marshal, or any civil officer of the Government, was sent to summon him, he could dismiss him, and put in another; he had the military and naval power in his own hands, and all the officers of Government held their offices at his will. The resolution was no way hostile to the President. Supposing it was admitted that there was an assumption of power over the constitution and laws, could the Senate do nothing? It was the right and the duty of the Senate to express an opinion, and the resolution was nothing more. But it was said that the Senate could not act without acting on the quo animo. But the resolution only affirmed that the act done, was not in accordance with the sentiments of the Senate. What then, he asked, had the President done? In his first speech on this subject, he (Mr. C.) had said that it was not the act of the Secretary, but of the President—and since then an honorable member from Tennessee [Mr. GRUNDY] had said distinctly, that this was not the act of the Secretary, but emphatically the act of the President, and whatever of praise or blame was due for it, was due to the President alone. This Mr. C. considered as high authority, and entitled to great weight, coming from a gentleman who came from the same city that the President did. What the resolution affirmed was, that by the proceedings of the President he had assumed a power not granted to him by the constitution and laws; and he defied gentlemen to point out an instance in the history of the Government, where a head of a department was required to perform a duty, and a President had interposed his authority. Mr. Gallatin, in the late report of the Union Committee, affirmed that this was the first instance of such an occurrence. A gentleman from Virginia, not now here, [Mr. RIVES,] had said that this was an abstract proposition; but Mr. C. contended it was not so. It was a distinct affirmation of an opinion on the part of the Senate. And if both Houses should say—he did not care if it was by a majority of but one vote—that the reasons assigned by the Secretary were unsatisfactory and insufficient, it was his duty to restore them; his act was vacated, and no form of joint resolution or bill was necessary to effect the restoration. The subject could not be brought within the power of the veto. It was his duty to restore them, and he ought to perform it. Whether he would perform it or not, Mr. C. could not say; but public sentiment would compel him to do it. Mr. C. then took up the argument urged, that all the executive power was vested in a President of the United States, without limitation. He had heard no limit to it whatever; but, on the contrary, the assertion of a power which was greater than that possessed by any king in Europe. He contended that the provision in the constitution that the “executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States,” was not an express grant of power, but a designation of the person in whom the executive power should be vested. He then referred to the constitutional provision for the judicial department: that “the judicial department shall be vested in a Supreme Court of the United States, and such other courts as the Congress shall from time to time appoint.” This, he maintained, was the recipient of the power, not the grant of the power. The constitution proceeded in another part of it, to wit, the 2d section of the 2d article, to designate the powers granted to the President, beyond which he could not go, and that the argument that the President was invested with all the powers he had assumed, by the provision that he should see “that the laws were faithfully executed,” was without foundation. That this provision never was designed to give him the power of requiring public officers to perform their duties according to his will and pleasure. That the Executive power was in its very nature fundamental; that where the constitution gave him power, Congress could not impair it or take it away—but where Congress gave, Congress could shape or alter it as they thought proper. He denied that the President was invested with the power of control, as incident to the power of appointment. That the chief object in the establishment of the Government under the present constitution, was to pay the debts of the United States; hence the provision for that purpose in the 6th article. With this object in view, the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund were appointed, of whom the Vice President was one, and the Chief Justice of the United States was another, neither of whom were removable by the President. That although the heads of the State, War, and Navy Departments were emphatically the mouth-pieces of the President; yet the Treasury was one over which the control of Congress was complete, and therefore the President had no right to interpose his authority over the head of that department. Mr. C. then adverted to the position maintained by some gentlemen, that all the officers of Government held their places at the pleasure of the President. He had never, until now, heard it contended that the President had a right to superintend and direct the action of an officer under his own will. He had, to be sure, a general controlling power, to see the officer at his post in the proper discharge of his duty. But he was to leave him there, to act upon his own responsibility. He had never heard such an interpretation of the President's power until in these more modern times. A similar provision, that the Governor shall “see that the laws are faithfully executed,” was to be found in the constitutions of several of the States; but it never was pretended that the Governors possessed power under it, to the extent contended for here. The last foundation relied on by the advocates of this power, was the responsibility of the President. What was responsibility? What was the responsibility of a President whose ambition was not satisfied? Where was the responsibility of a President who assumed all power; who wished to ascend the throne? Suppose that case. In 1789, the argument was used, that a removal from office, by the President, on account of political opinions, rendered him liable to impeachment. Impeachment! Such a thing as impeachment, Mr. C. considered as almost impracticable. “I take the responsibility,” was, in his view, an unmeaning sound. Was there really any responsibility? No. Was the President responsible for the conduct of the receiver of public moneys in New Orleans? or even of the collector, almost under his eye, at Alexandria? No, he was not responsible. Suppose Mr. Duane had, or had not, removed the deposits, could the President have been impeached for it? Not at all. He was only responsible for his own act. In truth, it removed, it destroyed responsibility. A Secretary of the Treasury was called on to remove the deposits against his judgment—did it not annihilate his responsibility? Could he be put in a position to be liable to removal, if he did not obey the command, and liable to impeachment if he did obey it? It was impossible. What became of the oath of the officer, if this doctrine were true? He was sworn to perform the duties of his office, according to his best judgment; and yet this doctrine spread the power of the President over the whole country, and gave him a control over every officer in it. Mr. C. then proceeded at length to answer the argument that the President was bound only to execute the laws according to his understanding of them, and contended that if this were true, the Executive was the supreme department of the Government, and no others could move without him. He also contended that the President was bound to execute the laws in force; and if he assented to a law, by approving it, he was bound by it. If he refused to sanction it, and exercised the veto, and it was afterwards passed by two-thirds, he could not refuse, but was equally bound to execute it.

[Mr. C. here gave way to a motion to adjourn, which prevailed. He resumed and concluded his remarks on the succeeding day, as follow:]

Mr. CLAY resumed his argument, by submitting a modification of his resolution, which was read at his request. He then said, he had endeavored to show, yesterday, that the advocates of the President had claimed for him all executive power, whether it was primitive, constitutional, or conferred by the legislature. If he possessed all this power, there was but one feature wanting to complete the picture of a despotism, to which all that was claimed for him inevitably tended. With the possession of these, we might have the appearance of a republic, but, in effect, we would be as genuine a despotism as ever existed. If the President had a right to remove a Secretary of the Treasury, or order him to do an act contrary to his judgment, he had the same power over the Treasurer, the Comptroller, and the Register; and if so, then there was but one will, and that was the President's. He condemned the argument maintained by gentlemen, that the power of appropriation was a check on the power of the Execu-time; for if the President could control the officers of the Treasury, what check was the power of appropriation? The only substantial checks were when the laws were respected and allowed to take their course. The doctrines contended for were not American doctrines—they were not the doctrines of freemen, nor of England, at this day, but rather of the Stuarts. Mr. C. contended that the whole control of the money power of the country was reposed in the representatives of the people and the States. Its collection, safe-keeping, and disbursement, and the annual account of it, was confided to them alone, to the utter exclusion of the Executive. The constitution conferred on Congress the power to lay and collect taxes; to pass all laws necessary and proper to carry into effect the powers granted; and having conferred these powers, nothing was left for the Executive to act on. That officers made by Congress, were therefore responsible to Congress alone. Mr. C. then argued that the control of the money power of the United States was, and ought to be, in Congress alone, from the fact that in nineteen out of the twenty-four States, the legislatures appointed the respective treasurers, and in all the others, the legislatures have, in effect, the control over the treasurer, and, in no instance, was the treasurer removable by the executive authority of the State. He thought, therefore, there was just cause of alarm when we considered the powers claimed for the Executive by gentlemen. Even if the Secretary of the Treasury was an executive officer, there were duties conferred on such officers which were exclusively legislative in their character, and which the Executive had no control over. He instanced the duty of the Secretary of State, in relation to patents and the Patent Office—and where a patent had issued for land which had been surveyed; where, if he had gone through all the forms of law, the President had no right to arrest it, because it was not his act, but the act of the law, and issued in conformity to law. On this point, then, he came to the conclusion that the whole powers of the Government, in relation to the disbursement, safe-keeping, and accounting for the public money, was in Congress alone. Gentlemen had invoked precedents, and contended that, at the origin of the Government, there had been instances of the exercise of a similar power. But, at that time, there was no Treasury by law; no provision in the old bank charter for the depository of the public money, as there was in the 16th section of the present—but he asserted, that so far from that being a precedent, the public money remained in the old bank until within seven days of its expiration, and was then removed only by the voluntary agreement of the bank. Mr. Crawford came into office in the autumn of 1816—the bank charter was passed in April, 1816, and, on the 30th April, a resolution was passed giving the Secretary plenary powers to bring about a restoration of specie payments. The subject of the bank was then in the complete power of Congress; and in December, 1816, Mr. Crawford commenced his operations under the resolution. But he did not withdraw the money from the banks—he rather suffered it to remain in their hands till it was drawn out by the ordinary demands of the Government; his object was to break all connexion with the local banks, and to form a connexion with the Bank of the United States exclusively. But the object of the present Secretary was directly the reverse of this—desiring to cut loose from the Bank of the United States, and attach himself to the local banks. He contended, therefore, that neither the state of the law or fact under which Mr. Crawford acted, was the same as that under which the present Secretary acted. In regard to precedents, Mr. C. said that the power of Congress to charter a bank was recognised in innumerable instances, and yet there was no authority now for the same thing. The partisans of the Executive, he contended, had no right to precedents. Gentlemen had entered the field of precedents, and had broken down all precedents, except here and there a solitary stalk, which they picked up and threw down at our feet, and asked us to take as fruit. They who denied all the lights of experience and wisdom, what right had they to the benefit of precedents? On the great subjects of the tariff and public improvements, which had been broken down, he entertained the same opinions he always had; but if the people were willing to prostrate them, no one was more willing to bow to their will than he was; and if the people were willing to have their money in State institutions, be it so—he would be content. He then contended that the power of Government was exercised in dispensing patronage among favorites and partisans; and the issuing of transfer drafts to aid the State banks, was a part of that system. He contended that such drafts were never before issued, except for the public service—that it subjected the banks to whom they were issued, to an alarming degree of controlling power by the Executive—because, if to day the Government could endorse for the banks, to-morrow the banks could endorse for men in power. Mr. C. asked whether, in all soberness, there was no cause of apprehension to our institutions, when we contemplated the rapid strides of Executive power. In vain did gentlemen deceive themselves, that the question was bank or no bank. Give us back the authority of the laws—let the Executive retrace his steps, and he would be willing to see every stone in that splendid building in Chestnut street pulled down and returned to its native quarry; and would pledge himself never to vote for a bank again. We must have revenue, we must have an army and navy, which would be placed at the most imminent hazards in the hands of an ambitious man, if such a one were placed at the head of the Government—of blasting the fairest hopes of the civilized world. The question he denied to be one of bank or no bank. It was a question of the dominion of the laws—of the violated constitution. Whether we should have liberty or slavery eventually, was a question placed beyond all doubt. Mr. C. then recounted the first encroachments of Executive power, all of which, however, he did not charge to this administration; he said it began at a much earlier day. The removal from office without the consent of the Senate, was one—the next was the creation of a cabinet, for which he denied there was any right granted by the constitution. The President was authorized to call on the heads of Departments for their opinions in writing, but that was all. There was no provision in the constitution for counsellors to the President; this encroachment did not originate with, but had been enlarged by this administration, by the introduction of the head of the Post Office Department to the council board; he denied the wisdom of a cabinet, as destructive of the responsibility of each head of the Departments. The next was the negotiation of treaties, and sending off ministers without the consent of the Senate—this was in direct violation of the spirit of the constitution—that instrument supposed a prior consultation with the Senate. But the practice was to form treaties and submit them afterwards. So of foreign ministers, the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, was to appoint, and yet the practice had been to send them off immediately before and after the session of the Senate. He was no minister till appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate—yet this administration was in the habit of sending off all important ministers, without regard to vacation. The President was authorized to issue temporary commissions to run to the end of the next session; but it never was the design of the constitution to delay the nominations till the end of the next session; that provision was designed to guard against accidents and delays from postponement, &c. He contended that the constitution supposed the Senate to be a part of the appointing power, and yet we had now been in session four months, and two of the highest officers in the Government were daily acting under appointments made without previous consultation with the Senate. This was a departure from the spirit of the constitution. The appointment to the same offices after the rejection of the Senate, as if in contempt of the Senate, and the extraordinary exercise of the veto power, withholding bills after their passage through both Houses, and neglecting to execute the laws and treaties after they had obtained the sanction of the Senate, were other encroachments. And last, though not least, the union of the sword and the purse, upon doctrines advanced by the President. And if, to all these, you added the vast patronage of the Government, and the vast number of expectants for office, he asked if greater encroachments were not to be apprehended, till the liberties of the people should be swallowed up in the vortex. He compared the Executive mansion to a great eastern bazar, where official merchandise of every variety was vended, from the bureau of the glittering mission, to the humble deputy of the Post Office Department; that although there were many more disappointed than successful applicants for office, yet their hopes were always buoyant and elastic, and, if not successful to day, they were told that there were many good things in store for them, and thus they were continued in the support of the administration from time to time, the applicant gaining strength and increasing in hope from his former failure. Mr. C. concluded, by expressing his confidence in the intelligence and patriotism of the people to correct all these errors. He alluded to the coming elections in Virginia and Kentucky, and said, that until they sustained the present state of things, he would never despair.

FRIDAY, MARCH 28.

ALBANY MEMORIAL.

Mr. WEBSTER presented a memorial signed by about twenty-eight hundred of the citizens of Albany, ascribing the embarrassed condition of the pecuniary affairs of the country to the removal of the public depositories from the Bank of the United States, praying for their restoration, and for the re-charter of that institution.

On presenting this memorial, Mr. WEBSTER addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President: I have the honor to present to the Senate, a memorial from the city of Albany.

New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Boston, have already laid before Congress, the opinions entertained in those cities by men in all classes of society, and of all occupations and conditions in life, respecting the conduct of the administration in removing the public depositories. To these, Albany now joins her voice—a voice not less clear, not less strong, not less unanimous, than that of her sister cities.

It is well known no you, sir, and to gentlemen on the floor of the Senate, that Albany, for its size, is an extremely commercial city. Connected with the sea by one of the noblest rivers on earth, it is placed, also, at the point, at or near which many hundred miles of inland navigation, from the west and from the north, accumulate the products of a vast and fertile interior, and deliver them, for further transport, into receptacles proper to be borne on tide-waters, or to be impelled by steam. In return for these riches of inland industry, thus abundantly poured forth to the sea, Albany receives, of course, large amounts of foreign merchandise, to be forwarded inward, and to be distributed for consumption in the western district of the State, along the shores of the lakes, and even to the banks of the Mississippi itself. It is necessarily, therefore, a place of vast exchanges of property; in other words, a place of great trade. Albany, I believe, sir, has a population of twenty-eight or thirty thousand people. It has given, I learn, on interesting occasions, nearly, but not quite, thirty-eight hundred votes. The paper, sir, whose folds I am now unrolling, and which I have risen to present to the Chair, bears twenty-eight hundred names, all believed to be qualified electors. Great pains have been taken to be accurate in this particular; and if there be a single name to this paper not belonging to a qualified voter, it is not only here by mistake, but here after careful scrutiny has been had, for the purpose of avoiding such mistakes. Every man, sir, whose name is here, is believed to have a right to say "I am an American citizen; I possess the elective franchise; I hold the right of suffrage; I possess and exercise an individual share in the sovereign power of the State; I am one of those principals, whose agent Government is, and I expect from Government a proper regard to my interests."

It will thus be seen, sir, that this paper expresses the sentiments of three-fourths of as many citizens of Albany as have ever been collected, on any occasion, at the polls of the city. What these sentiments are, the Senate will be at no loss to understand, when the paper shall be read. Its signers possess the faculty of making themselves fully understood. This memorial, sir, is brought hither for the purpose of being laid before Congress, by a committee of eighteen persons. Some of these gentlemen are well known within the walls of the Capitol, and none of them altogether unknown to members of this or the other House. They come, sir, to vouch for the general respectability of the signers to the memorial. They come to answer for them, as persons capable of perceiving, not only the general fact, that recent measures of Government have deranged the business of society, but of seeing also precisely how those measures have operated on their own business, their own employments, and their own prosperity. Unpromising, sir, as the task is, ungrateful, nay, almost hopeless as it is, this committee has not declined the wish of their fellow-citizens, that they would bring this solemn appeal to the notice of the two Houses of Congress. They have come to vouch for the general respectability of the signers of the memorial; for the fact that they number among them individuals of every class, occupation, employment, profession, and trade, in society. And they come to make good, sir, the declarations of the memorial as to the state of things actually existing at Albany. Albany, sir, has been flourishing and prosperous, and seemed rapidly rising to greater and greater heights of commercial importance. There are circumstances which would appear to have favored Albany, and to have enabled her to stand the shock better than her neighbors. In addition to her capital, it has been understood that she was benefited, in her money operations, to a considerable extent, by the use or the custody of State funds. But the Senate will not be surprised to learn, notwithstanding all her advantages, that she has not escaped the general disaster. Whatever else is to be said against the Secretary's measures, they cannot be charged with being partial in their operation. They have the merit of impartiality, inasmuch as they produce universal distress.

Sir, our condition is peculiar. One hardly knows how to describe it. In the midst of all the bounties of Providence, and in a time of profound peace, we are poor. Our Secretary of the Treasury, sir, is not Midas. His touch does not turn every thing to gold. It seems rather to turn every thing into stone. It stops the functions and the action of organized social life, and congeals the whole body politic. It produces a kind of instantaneous petrification. We see still the form of our once active social system, but it is without life. We can trace the veins along its cold surface, but they are bloodless; we see the muscles, but they are motionless; the external form is yet fair and goodly, but there is a cessation of the principle of life within.

SENATE.]

Albany Memorial.

Sir, if one could look at the state of the country, at this moment, who had never heard what that "experiment" is, which the Secretary is trying, he would naturally suppose him to be some necromancer, some Prospero, who had power over the principle of action, in the whole nation, and who was amusing himself, by the exercise of that power, in seeing what sort of a spectacle a great, busy, stirring community would exhibit, when his wand should bring all its members to a sudden pause; check them in a moment of great activity, and hold every one in the precise attitude in which he should be found, when the charm begins; as painters, though they cannot represent progressive action on the canvass, can yet represent action suddenly arrested; or as the interior of the mountains discloses animals caught in full life and vigor, and imbedded forever in the subsiding elements of the general deluge. Or perhaps, sir, such a spectator might suppose that our Secretary had been imitating infantile curiosity, which thrusts its busy fingers into the opened watch, for the sake of seeing how pretty its little wheels will look when they all stand still. But, whatever a disinterested beholder might think of the manner in which the Secretary is amusing himself with "experiments" upon the nation, the people of Albany have had quite enough of experiment. They find it efficient for every thing but good. There are some things, they admit, which it has fully proved. It has proved the rashness, the delusion, and almost the insanity of those who undertook it.

One of the most visible effects of this measure, to the people of Albany, is its check to the growth of the city. It has been fast increasing, in houses, and in the number of its inhabitants. But here are persons well acquainted with the facts and circumstances, who declare that the houses in building, this year, are not one-twentieth the number of the last year. What is to be said in answer to that fact? The carpenter and the mason are standing still, with the rule and the trowel in their hands, to see when the Secretary shall have done with his experiment.

Albany is a great lumber market. The very large sum of two millions of dollars is usually paid annually for this article in that city. But there is now no demand for it. The same causes operating elsewhere which operate in Albany, the timber is not wanted, cannot be used, and cannot be paid for. A great coasting trade is, also, in ordinary times, carried on from Albany. Lumber and other articles, brought down the canals, are taken down the river, and scattered all along the shore, almost to the eastern extremity of the Union. And we all know what numbers of sloops and steamboats usually cover the surface of the Hudson, from its mouth to Troy. Last year, as I learn, from thirty to thirty-five steam tow-boats found employment between Troy and Albany and New York. This great extent of navigation gave wages, of course, to multitudes of industrious men, whose present power of finding employment may be judged of by the fact that six or eight of these boats are at this time adequate to the calls of commerce. The whole business, it is said, has fallen off at least two hundred per cent.

It is natural to ask, sir, how the times have affected the usefulness of the great canal, the true glory of New York, that imperishable monument of the fame of a great man—a man of conceptions large enough to embrace a high and noble purpose, and who had steadiness to pursue that purpose, through evil report and good report, let the strife of temporary party do its best, and its worst, until he had accomplished it. I am told, sir, that a long line of this great work, the quantity of flour now ready to be embarked, when the season of business commences, is not more than equal to one-tenth of the amount last year. The wheat is in the country, but there is no demand for it in the city. The farmers and the millers are obliged to keep it on hand. At the commencement of the harvest last year, wheat was worth a dollar a bushel, in the western part of New York, and where, as I am now informed, it goes off heavily at 68 and 70 cents. There are cases in which the article has been carried to the usual place of sale, and carried back again for want of buyers. Indeed, an instance is mentioned of a vessel, which proceeded from one of the towns on the river, to New York, lay at the wharf a week, without being able to sell a dollar's worth of her cargo, and then returned back with it to her place of departure.

It will be at once seen, that those measures of Government, of which the memorialists complain, neutralize the benefits of the canal. They lower the price of wheat, in the western part of the State, as much as the opening of the canal raised it. The cause of all this loss is obvious. There is no market; and there is no market because there is no money; and there is no money because the measures of Government have deranged the currency, checked circulation, and shaken credit.

One of the gentlemen now here is extensively concerned in the business of transportation on the western and northern canals. He is connected with lines, which own, together, two hundred canal boats, and usually employ fourteen or fifteen hundred men, and as many horses. An immediate loss of employment, for at least half of this capital, and of these hands, is already among the consequences of the Secretary's experiment. This shows, sir, how the measures of Government affect wages, ay, sir, wages—the only source of the poor man's income. Be it remembered, that the administration is waging war for the benefit of the poor. It has attacked the bank, laid hold of the public treasures, disregarded the votes of Congress, and thrown the whole country into a state of violent excitement, out of pure sympathy for the poor, and to protect them against the grinding power of moneyed corporations! Well, sir, are the poor better off? Are wages higher? Is employment more easily obtained? Is labor more richly rewarded? Let the Senate judge of this matter, when I state, as I am authorized to do, that men in Albany, who, three months ago, were earning and receiving a dollar and a quarter a day, six days in the week, are now soliciting employment, for two days in the week only, and for sixty-two cents a day. And other industrious men, who were receiving a dollar a day, are now content to work for their board only. There is in the city a large manufacture of iron castings for stoves, hollow ware, machinery, &c. Since December, it is said, this manufacture has fallen off one-half, and that a hundred hands have been discharged in a day, most of them heads of families. If this be so, sir, and the case be but a common one, a fearful account must be running up against those who have heedlessly brought such calamities on the laboring classes. There is also, I hear, a very extensive fur business done in the place; a single establishment employing no less than five hundred men and women in the manufacture of caps, of which article no less a number than two thousand is manufactured daily, in the season of work—if any one can conceive where they find heads for so many. From causes, like those which affect other manufactures, this, I hear, is also unfavorably affected, as regards the great number of persons to whom it gives employment.

It would be easy, sir, to run into other details, and other particulars. It would be easy to follow the effects of this derangement of the currency, out only into all classes, but until we find it affecting the concerns of all individuals, and touching the home comforts of every family. But such detail would be only repetition. All evidence and all argument must be lost on those who do not already, from what the country exhibits on all sides, see, and feel, and acknowledge, that the distress of the times is universal and unparalleled.

If, indeed, these memorialists, or other petitioners from the same State, needed confirmation in their representation of the present state of things, it might be abundantly found in the late communication from the Executive of New York to the legislature. Distress is no fiction, when the extraordinary measure of a State loan is resorted to, to sustain the common operations of business, and to give new credit, or at least new power of accommodation, to the banks. It is no trifle, certainly, when such a measure is proposed, and when it is recommended, not indeed by the Executive himself, but by those who support and justify it, by reference to precedents in revolutionary times, and in the days of State bills of credit. It is no merely pretended state of alarm, when the banks find two millions of their own paper returning upon them, while they curtail their loans but 600,000 dollars only. This message, sir, admits a state of things, and argues upon a state of things, the existence of which has hitherto been loudly denied, by nearly all the friends of the administration. As to the measure proposed by the Executive of New York, it becomes me, of course, to say little of it, and indeed to say nothing, except so far as not only New York, but the whole country, may have an interest in it. I abstain from any thing of a local nature, or belonging exclusively to State politics and State concerns. But, Mr. President, I may be permitted, I hope, to say, that it fills me with deep and unfeigned regret, for the present, and with sad, sad forebodings for the future, to see the great State of New York, instead of concurring in experienced and well-approved national measures, to promote a national object, intent only on applying local means for local relief.

Instead of giving a lead, in the national councils, to measures of a general character, such as embrace the whole country, and such as she herself has heretofore repeatedly supported, it is painful to see her denying to this Government powers so long acknowledged by herself rightfully to belong to it, and to find her driven to measures, of at least a novel and questionable nature, to uphold those interests which she, and a majority of all the other States, have heretofore not only admitted, but strenuously contended, were confided to the just guardianship of the General Government.

I observed the other day, sir, and I said it neither for the sake of sounding an alarm, nor of turning a sentence, that, if this experiment of the Executive Government is suffered to go on, it will bring us to consequences nearly touching the powers and the continued action of this Government. I verily think so. As surely, sir, as you sit in that chair, or as I stand on this floor, our tendencies, at the present moment, are strong towards disorganization, to the times of State securities, bills of credit, separate State currencies, and paper money, and, if those tendencies be not seasonably arrested, they will make shipwreck of our highest interests. The chain of a common currency, a common standard of value, a common medium of exchange, is in imminent danger of being broken. Induced by our relinquishment of our own just rights, and the abandonment of our own proper powers and duties, individual States, under an alleged necessity march on, but without concert or co-operation, to greater and greater control over the currency of the country.

Whatever gentlemen may say of the limitation of the power of Congress to the exclusive regulation of coin merely, I cannot but be persuaded that that authority, which is to regulate, by paramount laws, the commerce between the States, must of course regulate that, whatever it may be, which is to perform the office of money in carrying on this commerce. Can any man maintain, that the sovereign power over commercial regulation rests in Congress, but that the power, nevertheless, of regulating the great agent of that commerce, money, is vested in twenty-four different States? Is our system thus disjointed and deformed? I repeat, sir, what I have so often said, and what I believe with the utmost sincerity of conviction to be true, that unless by wise legislative provisions, enacted by the authority of Congress, we secure the safety of the currency, we are not only in great peril of a paper money system, but we omit to maintain that which is one of the best, the easiest, the most grateful, and the strongest ties of our national Union.

When it had become doubtful whether the present Bank of the United States would be continued, and especially after it was supposed probable that no bank would hereafter exist, under the authority of Congress, we know what followed. Gigantic projects of State banks sprang up every where. We hear of propositions for new banks, with very large capitals, in Kentucky, Tennessee, Ohio, and Louisiana. And now, sir, we see a motion in the legislature of New York for a new bank of ten millions, only giving way to a proposal for a State loan of four millions, (it may probably be much larger;) and we see, at the same time, in Pennsylvania, an application for a bank with ten millions capital, and a power to have branches in other States.

Mr. President, we are thus breaking off from our accustomed course of public policy, on this great question of the currency. We are throwing its disposition into other hands: and we are doing this, because the constitutional power of Congress to establish a bank is denied; denied in quarters where it has heretofore been most zealously asserted. The respectable gentlemen who represent the State of New York, in the Senate, both of them stand up now, in the forty-fifth year of the Government, and declare, as representatives of the State of New York, that Congress transcends its power when it establishes a bank! This, sir, is not a little extraordinary, nor a little portentous.

Mr. President, I have faith, stronger than that of most of others. I believe in the duration of this Government; and I mean, if possible, to die believing; but, I confess, I sometimes feel misgivings, when I see powers of Government, of the very highest importance, held to be constitutional or unconstitutional, according to the prevailing party politics of the moment; powers, found in the constitution to-day, at the first glance, but not to be found in it to-morrow by the most searching construction; powers to-day, safe, necessary, and useful; to-morrow unsafe, unnecessary, and destructive of liberty. Sir, when these respectable gentlemen were in their cradles, or in the schools, the delegation from New York, in both Houses of Congress, gave their unanimous support to the bill incorporating the first Bank of the United States. They went, to a man, with General Washington, affirming the constitutionality of the bank, owning its expediency, and actually creating and establishing it. This was the constitutional opinion of New York in 1791. In her delegation, in both Houses, were gentlemen who had been active and leading members in the convention which formed the constitution, and had just come fresh from that great work, into Congress. Having helped to frame it, having argued it before the people, they came now to administer it. With the constitution before them, the work of their own hands, with a perfect knowledge of their own purposes, and the purposes of others, in framing it, they voted to establish a bank. We know that, of all the members of the first Congress who had been members of the convention, very few voted against the bank, on any ground whatever. A great majority—I believe three or four to one—were in favor of it, on all grounds. New York, at least, was unanimous: with her there was no doubt nor hesitation.

In 1811, the charter of this first bank expired. It was a day of great party excitement, and party did unquestionably mingle itself with the proposition for the renewal of the charter. The constitutional question was then raised, and the bill for continuing the bank was rejected, if I remember, by the majority of a single vote in one House, and by the casting vote of the Presiding Officer in the other. Of those voting against the renewal, some proceeded on grounds of constitutional objection, and others on other grounds, as was recited to us, fully and particularly, some sessions ago, by an honorable gentleman, then a member of the Senate from Maryland.

But those who, at that time, voted against continuing the first bank, found, by even a short experience, that they had taken an erroneous view of the subject. Within three years, they became themselves strenuous advocates for a bank; and when the bills of 1814 and 1815 were before Congress, the New York members, generally speaking, were among their most zealous advocates; or, if any of them were opposed, such opposition did not rest at all on any constitutional objections. Bills, sir, which I thought were unconstitutional—bills which I could not vote for—bills which I thought contained such provisions as transcended the power of Congress; such, for example, as that exempting the proposed bank from specie payment—found zealous and able supporters among the members from New York; none more able, none more zealous. And, sir, when the present bank itself was established, in 1816, how was it then? Was the great State of New York then found standing on constitutional objections? was she found opposing the bank, as a great moneyed power, dangerous to liberty, establishing an aristocracy, and without an inch of ground to stand on, in the constitutional power of Congress? Was judicial authority then rejected, all precedents resisted, and the acquiescence of the people and of the States set at naught and derided? Was there even the slightest doubt expressed, of the power of Congress to make a bank? Far from it. Of the twenty-seven members from New York then in the other House, only seven voted against the bill, and most of those seven are known to have so voted, not on constitutional grounds, but on particular objections to some parts of the bill. Indeed, most or all the seven had not long before voted for a bank, with provisions somewhat different, and such as suited them better. Constitutional scruples, therefore, there were none. One of the votes of the Senate, it is possible, though I know not the fact, may have been given on such scruples; but it is safe to say, that at least nine-tenths of the delegation of New York, in both Houses of Congress, either actively supported the establishment of the present bank, or fully and expressly admitted the power of Congress to create it. It was created; they helped to create it; without them it could not have been created. It is the creature of New York opinions and New York power. And in all this, sir, the legislature acquiesced, and the people acquiesced.

Now, sir, when this plain and incontestable history of the past, is contrasted with the solemn declarations, the labored arguments, and the patriotic invocations to liberty, which we have heard uttered on this floor against all national banks, and all power of Congress to establish such banks, is it without reason that I consider such changes of opinion and conduct as things not auspicious to the future progress of our Government? Is it mere faintheartedness, which brings on these forebodings, when I thus see that opinions, on great questions of the power of Congress, change their hues, and run through all the colors of the prism, according to the shifting attitudes, and varying positions, of temporary political parties?

But, Mr. President, if I may be allowed, since it affects questions of great common concern, to speak of opinions existing in States to which I do not belong, I fully believe, notwithstanding all appearances to the contrary, that three-fourths of the people of the State of New York always have been, and now are, clearly of opinion that a bank of the United States is a constitutional, a useful, and a necessary institution of this Government. I speak, sir, of the spontaneous sentiments of the people, and not of such principles of action as, being recommended by organized bodies, a majority of the people may be induced to adopt as the basis of political and party associations, and act upon accordingly; and I entertain not a particle of doubt, that, if the question could be put to-day, to the whole people of New York, unaffected by collateral matters, three-fourths of the whole would be in favor of a bank. Nor would it be at all difficult to give reasons for this opinion, notwithstanding any inference to the contrary from occurrences here.

But, sir, I am pursuing these reflections farther than the occasion will justify. I may not, sir, presume to address myself to the people of the State of New York; I may not take upon myself the character of an adviser to them; but since the good citizens of Albany, through their committee, have done me the honor to make me their organ on this occasion, I hope they will forgive me if I say to them that, for the evils which they suffer, they themselves must assist to furnish the remedy. A gentleman on the other side of the Senate, has said, and said truly, that these great questions must be settled at the polls. To the polls, then, let them be brought. If the right of suffrage be not an idle form, if self-government be not a delusion, if there be any thing true in the idea of popular intelligence, then political mismanagement must be corrected by political elections. I have said it so often, that it must fatigue the ear to hear it again, that redress can come only from the people themselves. I beseech the good citizens of Albany to lay this truth to heart.

If they are in earnest, if they really feel the evils of misrule, let them touch the right string to restore proper action to the machinery of government; let them take hold of the right lever. They complain of violation of law; let them seek to obtain the passage of other laws which shall redress such violation. They complain of Executive encroachment; as far as depends on them, let there be a legislature which shall allow no such encroachment. Some of them, with other citizens of the State, have lately acted on the principles of a motto, taken from the words of a great and good man, now removed from this scene of things. I would beseech those who have adopted that sentiment for one occasion, to apply it to another of still broader interest. It is a sentiment fit for any crisis, and especially suited to the present. It is a sentiment becoming republicans. It is a sentiment, fundamental to all free governments. I cherish it, not only as it is expressed in the words of a valued friend not now among the living, but for its plain truth, and its mighty importance. I beseech all who value the blessings of free government, and of civil liberty, to embrace it, and act upon it. I pray them to give it scope and energy, such as the present exigency of the country requires. Let it have power to overcome minor differences; let its conciliating influence unite the heart of man to man; let it melt all smaller objects into one great purpose of honest and resolute patriotism; and let all, who mean to die as they live, citizens of a free country, stand together for the supremacy of the laws.

The memorial was then read; after which,

Mr. WRIGHT said he was compelled, by various considerations, to make some remarks in reply to the Senator from Massachusetts, before he could consent to the final disposition of the memorial. He held another paper in his hand, said, and no doubt with truth, to contain the signatures of 1,700 of the citizens of Albany. It was not said to him by any one resident in Albany, but he had it from the best authority, that more than sixteen-sevenths of the signers were not only citizens but voters of that place. They were opposed to the sentiments contained in the memorial just presented. He did not intend to occupy the attention of the Senate at this time, unless the Senator from Kentucky, who was entitled to the floor, was willing to postpone the continuation of his remarks to another day. If the Senator would give way, he would go on with his remarks.

Mr. CLAY observed that he felt some reluctance to interfere with the remarks of the Senator from New York; but he was confident the Senate shared with him in the anxiety to go on with the debate on the resolutions which were the order of the day. Under these circumstances, if it met with the entire assent of the gentleman from New York, he would move to lay the memorial on the table, in order to give him an opportunity of making his remarks to-morrow. Mr. C. then made a motion to that effect; which was carried.

Mr. FORSYTH then suggested to the gentleman from Kentucky to take up his resolution on the subject of the Union Bank of Maryland.

Mr. CLAY said it was his intention to have called up that resolution yesterday, but the gentleman from Georgia, who he understood wished to address the Senate on the subject, was not then in his seat. He now proposed to call it up on Monday.

REMOVAL OF THE DEPOSITES.

The CHAIR having called the order of the day, being the resolution reported upon by the Finance Committee, with the other resolution moved by Mr. CLAY; and Mr. CLAY having resumed and concluded his speech, as heretofore given,

Mr. MOORE rose and said, he did not rise now with a view of entering into the discussion of this question, but for the purpose only of preventing, during these times of high political excitement, any misrepresentation of the views which influenced the vote he was about to record. The first question presented for the consideration of the Senate, was—whether the reasons assigned by the Secretary of the Treasury for the measure adopted in the removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States to the State institutions, in whose custody they had been placed, were satisfactory? Mr. M. said, it was his honest and clear conviction they were not satisfactory, but insufficient and untenable; and that, in the act and the manner of effecting their removal, was involved an assumption of power, the legitimate exercise of which properly belonged to the legislative department of the Government. But, admitting the removal of the public money, and the manner of that removal, to have been improper, and as meriting censure, yet their restoration to the Bank of the United States, under all the circumstances that surround us, he thought was fairly questionable; and particularly if the proposition for a re-charter of the bank, at this time, be viewed as settled in the negative, of which he could not entertain a doubt, their repossession by the Bank of the United States, for the short time it had to exist, could not be very important, either as related to the prosperity of the institution itself, or the interest of the community; whilst their withdrawal from the banks in whose custody they have been placed, would greatly reduce their means and power to afford that relief to the wants and distresses of the people, called for in every direction. But a more powerful consideration operating upon his mind, was the supposed will and wishes of a majority of those whom he had the honor to represent; for, although he was well aware that a very respectable minority, including gentlemen of the first intelligence and great moral worth, were decidedly opposed to this act of the Executive in the removal, and in favor of a restoration, yet he was bound to believe, from the indications of public sentiment which he had received, that a majority of the citizens of the State entertained different views, and he therefore gave his vote in favor of a tribute due to public opinion. At the same time, he would acknowledge that he should feel more sensibly the responsibility he was about to incur, in pursuing the course he had proposed, provided the final result, on this delicate question, depended in any manner upon his vote; but this, it was well known, was not the case. As related to the re-charter of the Bank of the United States, Mr. M. said, his opinion had undergone no change since this question was agitated on a former occasion, when he had made known such views as he entertained. But now, he felt that he was bound to oppose that measure by higher considerations than those which resulted from his own private views, either in the shape in which it had been brought to the view of the Senate by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WASSER], or that other form which had been suggested, and was in contemplation, by the honorable Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN.] He had said he was now bound by higher considerations than those resulting from his own private views—they were such as emanated from the expressed will and opinion of the General Assembly of the State which he had the honor, in part, to represent, as declared by resolutions adopted by both branches at the late session. Having said thus much, as related to the course pursued by the General Assembly relative to the re-charter of the Bank of the United States, he felt that it was due, in justice to the directory of the branch bank at Mobile, which was the only branch of the United States Bank located in Alabama, that he should say, the course pursued by the General Assembly could not have been induced by a belief that any unfriendly or improper deportment, on the part of the directory of the said branch, had been practised towards the State institutions; for we have every reason to presume a very different feeling prevailed; and, in proof of this position, he would beg leave to read an extract from the report of a joint committee appointed to examine the affairs and condition of the Bank of the State of Alabama, which is as follows:

"For several years past, this bank has been transacting business with the branch of the United States Bank at Mobile; and it appears that the conduct of said bank towards the State institutions was such as to draw forth the following resolution, which your committee deem proper, in the same spirit which originated the resolution, to give publicity to the sentiments therein contained. They are as follow:

"Resolved by the president and directors of the Bank of the State of Alabama, That, as an act of justice towards the office of discount and deposit of the Bank of the United States at Mobile, in order to give utterance and perpetuity to the sentiments of this board in relation to that institution, it is due to say, that, for its high-minded, just, and liberal policy towards this bank, it is entitled to our warmest approbation; and the wisdom and prudence by which it has been guided, have had powerful agency in elevating the character of the circulating medium of the State, and imparting a tone of health, vigor, and activity, to the commercial and moneyed transactions through all the ramifications of society."

To this report are subscribed the names of the following gentlemen, who are active and influential members, viz. Messrs. John B. Hogan, F. S. Lyon, and J. W. Lane, of the Senate, and Messrs. James Jackson, W. R. Hallett, and J. J. Ormond, of the House of Representatives. As an additional evidence of the existence of this conciliatory and friendly feeling, he might advert to the fact, that the directory of the branch of the Bank of the State of Alabama, at Montgomery, had recently refused to accept of the public deposits, on the application of the Secretary of the Treasury. Upon this event, he was not disposed to comment. The occurrence spoke for itself. In conclusion, he would say, he was not one of those who believed in the truth of the declaration that had been repeatedly made here and elsewhere, "that the question now pending was, whether we should have the republic without the bank, or the bank without the republic?" This declaration proceeded from a prejudiced mind, or one that did not justly appreciate the principles upon which our institutions and liberties were founded. Having now, as he hoped, sufficiently guarded himself against the danger of misrepresentation, as to the views which influenced the vote he was about to give, he would not longer trespass upon the patience of the Senate.

Mr. McKEAN, at the moment the questions were about to be taken, rose and said, that he intended to vote against both of the resolutions under consideration, for several reasons, but especially because they were exclusively censorious in their character, and were calculated further to distract and excite the angry feelings which already existed. If the resolutions pass, they effect no remedy for the extreme distress, of which we have heard so much, nor do they point to any future legislation for that purpose. His votes on these resolutions were not to be taken as evidence of what his course would be when a distinct proposition, granting relief to a suffering community, should be presented.

The question was then taken upon agreeing to the first of the resolutions, being that reported by the Committee on Finance, in the following words:

Resolved, That the reasons assigned by the Secretary of the Treasury for the removal of the money of the United States, deposited in the Bank of the United States and its branches, communicated to Congress on the 4th day of December, 1833, are unsatisfactory and insufficient.

And decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bibb, Black, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Ewing, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Kent, King of Ga., Knight, Leigh, Mangum, Naudain, Poindexter, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Silsbee, Smith, Southard, Sprague, Swift, Tomlinson, Tyler, Waggaman, Webster.—28.

NAYS.—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Forsyth, Grundy, Hill, Kane, King of Alabama, Linn, McKean, Moore, Morris, Robinson, Shepley, Tallmadge, Tipton, White, Wilkins, Wright.—18.

Mr. CLAY then, at the instance of some of his friends, modified his resolution, so as to read as follows:

Resolved, That the President, in the late executive proceedings in relation to the public revenue, has assumed upon himself authority and power not conferred by the constitution and laws, but in derogation of both.

And the question being taken on agreeing to this resolution, it was decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bibb, Black, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Ewing, Frelinghuysen, Kent, Knight, Leigh, Mangum, Naudain, Poindexter, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Silsbee, Smith, Southard, Sprague, Swift, Tomlinson, Tyler, Waggaman, Webster.—26.

NAYS.—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Forsyth, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, Kane, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Linn, McKean, Moore, Morris, Robinson, Shepley, Tallmadge, Tipton, White, Wilkins, Wright.—20.

So this resolution also was agreed to.

Mr. WAGGAMAN moved that, when the Senate adjourn, it adjourn to meet on Monday; but the motion was negatived—Ayes 21, Noes 23.

The Senate then adjourned.

SATURDAY, MARCH 29.

PUBLIC DISTRESS.

Mr. WEBSTER rose and said, he was requested to present to the Senate two memorials: one from the borough of Muncy, in the county of Lycoming, in the State of Pennsylvania, and the other from the township of Muncy creek, in the same county. These memorials, said Mr. W., set forth that great distress and scarcity of money prevail in that part of the country; that the price of nearly all kinds of produce has fallen one-fourth; that hundreds of citizens are thrown out of employment; that the times, instead of becoming better, appear to be going from bad to worse. They attribute these consequences to the interference of the Secretary with the public moneys. They are of opinion that the removal of the public deposits was imprudent, illegal, contrary to the spirit of the constitution and laws, and disrespectful to Congress. I trust, sir, it will give these memorialists pleasure to hear, as they now will do, that, in all these sentiments, the Senate of the United States, by decided majorities, has declared its concurrence. These memorials are numerous; signed; and signed, as I am informed, by men of all parties. That from the borough, it is said, has the name of almost every voter in the place attached to it. They are short, sensible, well written, and patriotic. I hope they may be read, printed, together with the names, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WEBSTER also presented the memorial of 312 inhabitants of Watervliet, New York, on the same subject, praying that their memorial may be considered as united with the one presented from the citizens of Albany a few days ago. Mr. W. said, he would not ask for the reading and reference of the Watervliet memorial, until the one from Albany (on the table) should be again taken up.

CULPEPER (VA.) MEMORIAL.

Mr. TYLER rose and said, that he had been desirous, for several days past, to present to the Senate the memorial of three hundred of the citizens of Culpeper county, in the State of Virginia, protesting against the Executive's proceedings in relation to the Bank of the United States. These memorialists state (said Mr. T.) that a considerable degree of distress exists in their section of the country, in consequence of the President's measures, and protest against them as an assumption of authority which the President has no right to claim. He expressed, the other day, when the memorial from Shenandoah county was before the Senate, the belief that they were whigs from the days of the Revolution down to the present time; and he had now to express the same opinions with regard to the people of Culpeper county. He had felt some regret that the citizens of Shenandoah were not so well informed of the state of public affairs, and of the effect of recent measures upon the pecuniary concerns of the country, as he himself, from his position here, was necessarily compelled to be; but, with regard to the people of Culpeper, it appeared that they did not proceed wholly uninformed on the subject of their memorial. The discussion in the latter county, preceding their memorial, had been of the most animated character. The people had been assembled together; elaborate debates had grown out of their meeting, and he now presented to the Senate the result of the votes of a large majority there assembled. The county of Culpeper, as he had before observed, had been distinguished for its whiggism from the commencement of the Revolution; and, if it had not been the first to hoist the revolutionary banner at the tap of the drum, they were second to but one county, and that was the good county of Hanover, which had expressed the same opinion with them on this all-important subject. He presented the memorial of these sons of the whigs of the Revolution, and asked that it might be read, referred to the appropriate committee, and printed.

The memorial was then read; when

Mr. LEIGH said he had nothing to add to what had been said by his colleague, on the subject of this memorial from Culpeper, in particular; but the memorial had suggested some considerations of a more general nature to his mind, which he begged leave to state, very briefly, to the Senate.

MARCH 29, 1834.]

Culpeper (Va.) Memorial.

[SENATE.]

He had remarked, for some time past, that, whenever any question of peculiar interest arose at the seat of Government, especially any party question, in which the conduct of the Executive was implicated, there had been an unusual agitation in the country lying on the great mail routes through Virginia, and among the rest, on the Piedmont route, running from this city to Culpeper, and thence southward, along the foot of the mountain, to Georgia; an agitation which he had been at a loss to account for; but what he was going to mention might, perhaps, disclose to the public one of the causes to which it was imputable. There have been, said Mr. L., many learned commentaries, written by the ablest jurists, on the constitution of the Federal Government, and many debates in Congress and in the State legislatures on the subject, in which our profoundest statesmen have exerted their utmost ability. But there has been a book lately published here—this Blue Book that I hold in my hand, containing a register of the names, employments, and compensations, of all officers and agents in the service of the United States—this Blue Book contains more information of the real character, of the practical operation, of the money action of this Government, than all that has ever been written or spoken besides. I confess that, until I saw it, I never had a conception of the patronage of the Executive, and particularly of that of the Post Office Department. The list of persons occupied in this Department occupies 267 pages; that of the other officers and agents of the Government, 186; the last 23 pages of the book are occupied with the list of mail contractors. The contract prices of each and all are stated, and under them the extra allowances (where there are any) are set down, and indicated by an asterism. I began my examination of this list of mail contractors with the State of Maine; and having heard a good deal of conversation since I came here on the subject of these extra allowances, I was agreeably surprised to see how few of these stars there were in Maine, and in the other New England States, and how small was the amount of the extra allowances in that part of the Union. The number of them, however, begins to increase in New York, and thence, gradually, till the mail routes cross the Potomac. Getting to Virginia, I found such a number of asterisms as quite astonished me—there is a perfect galaxy, a milky way, illuminating the mail routes through that State. In a single page (page 256) I find, among others, the following: Alexander Patterson, $2,300 contract price, $2,300* extra allowance; Peck & Welford, $5,221 contract price, $6,557* extra allowance; E. Porter & Co. $25,436 contract price, $28,232* extra allowance; D. A. & O. Saltmarsh, $8,000 contract price, $4,913* extra allowance; William Smith, (who lives in the county of Culpeper, from which this memorial comes, and if reports say true, takes a busy part in politics there,) $10,897 68 contract price, $9,550* extra allowance; and J. N. C. Stockton, $8,155 contract price, and $7,610* extra allowance.

These extra allowances, in that single page, (to which my attention was attracted by the light of those ominous stars,) amount, in the aggregate, to $39,162, while the aggregate of the contract prices is but $60,709. But what is most wonderful is, that, after passing the Virginia line, the stars begin to decrease in number and magnitude, though they still far exceed those in the Northern and Eastern States. The phenomenon is curious, and I am wholly unable to explain it. Now sir, I have always understood (and if I am wrong I pray gentlemen better informed to put me right) that, by law, the contracts for carrying the mail are required to be let to the lowest bidder; and that, for the purpose of having the service performed on the most moderate terms, proposals specifying the service required, are published in the newspapers. If these advertisements exhibit fairly the service to be performed, I cannot imagine how the extra allowances should be so numerous or of so large amount—and, at any rate, considering the amount of the extra allowances made at the discretion of the Department, it appears clearly that the contracts are not, in truth, let to the lowest bidder. Is it possible that the public advertisements specify only part of the services which the Department intends to require?—so that the initiated may safely underbid those who make no calculation on extra allowances for extra services, and then depend on this device of extra allowances for a full compensation? If this be the case, then here is a stupendous system of favoritism established, which must work corruption—and if not, there must be, at least, the most extraordinary degree of carelessness ever heard of. I find no pleasure in noticing this state of things any where, and yet less in contemplating the peculiar brilliancy of the starry firmament that hangs over Virginia. It bodes us no good.

The memorialists of Culpeper regard the removal of the deposits as a violation of the constitution and the laws—and no wonder! For, according to all my notion of law—those old-fashioned notions of law which have hitherto always prevailed throughout Virginia—the 16th section of the charter of the Bank of the United States is a law, which constitutes that bank and its branches, where branches are established, the Treasury of the United States; and, at all events, it is a law which requires that the public revenue, as it is collected, shall be deposited there, unless the Secretary of the Treasury shall otherwise direct, in which case he is to report his reasons to Congress, immediately, if in session, if not, at the commencement of the next session. He is required to report his reasons—not, I presume, for the purpose for which Jeremy Diddler asked his acquaintances if they had such a thing as sixpence in their pocket; that is, merely for information of the fact—but to enable Congress to judge of the sufficiency of the reasons, and to approve or disapprove the act. He is required to report his reasons to Congress—meaning, surely, to both Houses of Congress. If both Houses concur in opinion that the Secretary's reasons are well founded and sufficient, and approve his removal of the deposits, then the provision of the charter making the bank and its branches the depositories of the public treasure, is no longer law; but, unless both Houses concur in approving the act, the provision remains the law of the land.

If one House approve, and the other disapprove, the Secretary's act, still the law remains unchanged. The President, with the concurrence of one House of Congress alone, cannot make, suspend, alter, or repeal law. Now, suppose the House of Representatives shall finally approve Mr. Secretary Taney's reasons for the President's removal of the deposits from the bank, we shall see what effect the resolution of the Senate, recently adopted, will have on the conduct of the Executive. The case will then be precisely the same, in principle, as if the House of Representatives had unanimously disapproved the act, and the Senate had approved it by a bare majority. In that case, the President, with the concurrence of the Senate alone, persisting in withholding the deposits from the bank, would suspend or repeal a law of the land. In the case likely to occur, the President, with the concurrence of the other House alone, will suspend or repeal a law. He will, in effect, annihilate the powers of the Senate, the representative of the States, and the grand Federal feature of the Government, upon the preservation of which depends the very being of the State sovereignties; and then this Federal constitution will cease to exist!

If the President be sincere in his professions, (and I will not doubt it,) it is only the Bank of the United States that he wishes and is aiming to destroy; but he is lamentably mistaken; it is not the bank, it is liberty herself, on which his blows have fallen and are falling, and will, unless he shall forbear, or the people shall arrest his hand, smite her to death. [Here Mr. LEXON made an allusion to a scene in one of Mrs. Radcliffe's novels, in which a father was saved from the guilt of murdering his own daughter, by discovering a miniature picture of himself on her bosom, which he had bared in order to plunge his poniard in her heart.] If some providential circumstance should open the President's eyes to the real object against which his arm is uplifted, and he should then (as well I hope he would) forbear the fatal blow he meditates; in the joy I should feel at the escape and safety of the victim, I should most freely and heartily forgive all the faults he has ever committed.

Whenever we complain of the President's conduct, of the public faith violated, the legislative power contemned and trampled under foot, and the fundamental principles of the constitution subverted, by his acts, we are reminded of the glory of the victory of New Orleans, and of the laurels that adorn the hero's brow; and, as if these alone constituted a sufficient assurance to us of the safety of our institutions, this language has been repeated by Senators on this floor, in grave debate. I am not going to tear a single leaf from the wreath which his military service achieved for him; nor shall I now inquire how much of it will probably wither away, after he shall return from office and power, and cease to be the dispenser of rewards and honors. To me, his military glory gives no assurance of security. It has often occurred to me to reflect why it was that the happy imagination of the Greeks selected the laurel as the emblem of fame and glory. Was it because the laurel is a poisonous plant?—poisonous to those who bestow the crown, and to the hero on whom it is bestowed. Too often has the laurel crown intoxicated the hero, made him mad and dangerous, furious and mischievous, in his madness; and too often have the people been tempted, by the beauty of the crown they have bestowed, to trust themselves within the grasp of his power. I wish there may not have been distilled from Gen. Jackson's laurels, a poison fatal alike to himself, and to the constitution, the liberty, and the happiness of his country.

Mr. BENTON rose in reply to the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. LEXON.] He did not know what the President, or the Secretary of the Treasury, might think it necessary to do in consequence of the vote given by the Senate yesterday on the deposite resolutions; but did know that the Senate was not the Congress; and that it was to Congress only that the Secretary was to make his report of reasons for removing the deposites from the Federal banks. When the voice of Congress was heard, it might be proper for the President and Secretary to consider what ought to be done; but a voice from a single branch of Congress would never be taken, he presumed, for that of the whole body; much less the solitary voice of the Senate in a case relating to the revenue; a subject placed by the constitution under the peculiar guardianship of the House of Representatives, as the immediate representatives of the people. The Secretary was to report his reasons to Congress—at once, if in session—if not in session, immediately after the commencement of the next session. Now, said Mr. B., the Senate may be in session, and Congress not. The President may convene the Senate without the House of Representatives. The Senate may have its separate session; and has had many. He, Mr. B., in the course of his service, had attended three such sessions himself; and yet if the deposites had been removed during one of these Senatorial sessions, no report of his reasons would have been due from the Secretary to that body. If the President had convened the Senate last fall, a month or two months before the meeting of Congress, no report of the Secretary's reasons would have been due to them; because they would not have been the Congress; that session of Congress would not have commenced, immediately after which the reasons should be reported. Mr. B. said Congress could have but one voice; the two Houses might have two voices; and, if the voice of the Senate was one way, and that of the House of Representatives the other way, which was to govern? especially was the smaller body to govern the greater? the one most remote from the people to govern the one nearest to the people? the one which could not originate a money bill, to govern the one, in a question of revenue, which has the peculiar charge of the revenue, and the sole power of originating money bills?

Mr. B. did not know what the President and Secretary might think they ought to do in consequence of yesterday's vote; he knew what he thought they ought to do, and that was, nothing. So far from having the voice of Congress, there was no way for the Executive, or for the other half of Congress, to know what the Senate had done. Their resolutions were single, not joint. There was no way to communicate them to the President, or to the House. Joint resolutions went to both; single ones did not; and these resolutions might lie on the Senate journals till doomsday, and neither the President nor the House of Representatives could legally, regularly, or in any parliamentary way, know of their existence. They could not regularly take notice of them. These resolutions are anomalies. They have no relation to the House or the President; they lead to no action; they tend to disunite the two Houses, and to segregate their opinions. A joint resolution goes from one to another; it receives the action of both; it unites the sense of both; but this single resolution stays where it was born; it leads to no joint action, but to separate action—to no unanimity of opinion, but to diversity of opinion—to no harmony, but to discord between the Houses. For what is the House to think, of a pretension on the part of the Senate to assume to itself the powers of Congress?—to assume supreme jurisdiction over a subject, and that subject an affair of revenue, and set up its will as superseding the will of the House, and standing for the voice of the whole Congress? In every point of view, he, Mr. B., considered the Senate's proceedings as an anomaly; and that the best thing that could happen for the Senate would be, for the President and the House of Representatives to take no notice of it until a parliamentary communication of the proceeding could be made to them; and as that never could be done, so they would remain in ignorance of it forever. Certainly neither House can know what the other does, except from an authentic communication; certainly the President cannot know what is done in either House, except upon a regular communication, under the authority of the House. Newspaper reports, verbal intelligence, the statements of members, are no authority for co-ordinate branches of the Government to act upon; and, in parliamentary understanding, neither the House of Representatives nor the President knows any thing of the resolutions which were adopted here yesterday.

Being on his feet, Mr. B. would take notice of another remark which fell from the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. LEXON.] He spoke of the Bank of the United States as being the Treasury of the United States. It was not the first time he had so spoken of that bank, but this was the first time that he (Mr. B.) had found it convenient to call the attention of that Senator to an argument against his assumption, which had been several times used without drawing an answer from those who held, as he [Mr. LEXON] did, that the Federal bank was the Federal Treasury. Doubtless, they did not answer, because they thought the argument too insignificant to merit an answer. There were some, however, who thought otherwise—who thought that this argument annihilated the whole assumption; the only way to answer it, was to se-not to hear it. He (Mr. B.) wished to know if the Senator from Virginia was of the same mind, and therefore would state this argument to him. It was founded on the 14th fundamental article of what the charter called the constitution of the bank—the article which provided for the establishment of branches—and was in these words:

“The directors of said corporation shall establish a competent office of discount and deposit in the District of Columbia, whenever any law of the United States shall require such an establishment; also one such office of discount and deposit in any State in which 2,000 shares shall have been subscribed, or may be held, whenever, upon application of the legislature of such State, Congress may, by law, require the same: Provided, The directors aforesaid shall not be bound to establish such office before the whole of the capital of the bank shall have been paid up. And it shall be lawful for the directors of the said corporation to establish offices of discount and deposit wheresoever they shall think fit, within the United States or the territories thereof, to such persons, and under such regulations, as they shall deem proper, not being contrary to law, or the constitution of the bank. Or, instead of establishing such offices, it shall be lawful for the directors of the said corporation, from time to time, to employ any other bank or banks, to be first approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, at any place or places that they may deem safe and proper, to manage and transact the business proposed as aforesaid, other than for the purposes of discount, to be managed and transacted by such officers, under such agreements, and subject to such regulations, as they shall deem just and proper.”

Mr. B. went on to remark upon this article, that it placed the establishment of but one branch in the reach or power of Congress, and that one was in the District of Columbia—in a district of ten miles square—leaving the vast extent of twenty-four States, and three Territories, to obtain branches for themselves upon contingencies not dependent upon the will or power of Congress, or requiring her necessities, or even her convenience, to be taken into the account. A law of Congress could obtain a branch in this District; but with respect to every State, the establishment of the branch depended, first, upon the mere will and pleasure of the bank; and, secondly, upon the double contingency of a subscription, and a legislative act, within the State. If, then, the mother bank does not think fit, for its own advantage, to establish a branch; or, if the people of a State do not acquire 2,000 shares of the stock of the bank, and the legislature, therefore, demand it, no branch will be established in any State, or any Territory of the Union. Congress can only require a branch, in any State, after two contingencies have happened in the State; neither of them having the slightest reference to the necessities, or even convenience, of the Federal Government.

Here, then, said Mr. B., is the Treasury established for the United States! A Treasury which is to have an existence but at the will of the bank, or the will of a State legislature, and a few of its citizens, enough to own 2,000 shares of stock worth $100 a share! A Treasury which Congress has no hand in establishing, and cannot preserve after it is established; for the mother bank, after establishing her branches, may shut them up, or withdraw them. Such a thing has already happened. Branches in the West have been, some shut up, some withdrawn; and, in these cases, the Treasury was broken up, according to the new-fangled conception of a national Treasury. No! said Mr. B., the Federal bank is no more the Treasury of the United States than the State banks are. One is just as much the Treasury as the other; and made so by this very 14th fundamental article of the constitution of the bank. Look at it! Look at the alternative! Where branches are not established, the State banks are to be employed!

The Bank of the United States is to select the State bank; the Secretary of the Treasury is to approve the selection; and if he does so, the State bank so selected, and so approved, becomes the keeper of the public moneys; it becomes the depository of the public moneys; it transfers them; it pays them out; it does every thing except make discounts for the mother bank and issue notes; it does every thing which the Federal Government wants done; and that is nothing but what a bank of deposit can do. The Government makes no choice between State banks and branch banks. They are all one to her. They stand equal in her eyes; they stand equal in the charter of the bank itself: and the horror that has now broken out against the State banks is a thing of recent conception—a very modern impulsion; which is rebuked and condemned by the very authority to which it traces its source. Mr. B. said, the State banks were just as much made the Federal Treasury by the bank charter, as the United States Bank itself was; and that was sufficient to annihilate the argument which now sets up the Federal bank for the Federal Treasury. But the fact was, that neither was made the Treasury; and it would be absurd to entertain such an idea for an instant; for the Federal bank may surrender her charter, and cease to exist—it can do so at any moment it pleases—the State banks may expire upon their limitation; they may surrender; they may be dissolved in many ways, and so cease to exist; and then there would be no Treasury! What an idea, that the existence of the Treasury of this great republic is to depend, not upon itself, but upon corporations, which may cease to exist, on any day, by their own will, or their own crimes. Mr. B. hoped that the Senator from Virginia, (Mr. LEIGH,) who had just referred to the Federal bank as the Federal Treasury, would find an argument in this 14th fundamental article of the constitution of the bank, sufficiently large to claim his attention, and to receive from him that answer which others had deemed it too insignificant to merit.

Mr. LEIGH rose, and pledged himself to answer the argument of the Senator from Missouri as soon as the course of the debate would allow him to do so, without interfering with the rights of others who were now entitled to the floor.

Mr. GRUNDY said, he could not see any connexion between the extra allowances made by the Post Office Department and the memorial which had been presented to the Senate by the honorable member from Virginia, (Mr. TYLER)—but the gentleman [Mr. LEIGH] had found there was, and had, therefore, thought proper to introduce them. Now, for his (Mr. G.'s) part, he had never been in the habit of making de bene esse speeches, but he wished to obtain all the evidence that was to be had on this subject, before proceeding to any investigation of it. He had called for the information, having a desire to ascertain why these extra allowances had been made, and to what extent. The Postmaster General had answered the call, and the report was in the hands of the public printer, and would, he had been informed, be ready for the examination of the Senate in a few days. He would ask, would it not be better, then, to wait until they should have the means of ascertaining for what purpose those extra allowances had been made, what services were rendered for them, and whether or not the public had been materially benefited by them? When that information should have been laid before the Senate, he could assure the honorable Senator, that, if he saw that those extra allowances had not been for the public good, he would not be the advocate of such a measure. He would condemn it as much as any other individual. It was known that members of both Houses of Congress, when it was believed that the finances of the Department would justify the Postmaster General in extending the mail facilities, had pressed upon him, with all the influence of the region of country from which they came, to grant further accommodations, and they were accordingly made.

Now, was it to be said, that the Postmaster General should be censured for complying with their request, under those circumstances? All, perhaps, might join in saying one thing—that he had extended his accommodations too far, because the funds of the Department were not sufficient to cover them. It might have been better had the act been avoided: but, before Senators undertook to censure him, they ought first to ascertain whether he had any improper object in view—whether, in making those extra allowances, he had acted with partiality, and dispensed them among favorites. He (Mr. G.) imagined that would not turn out to be the case, at least he hoped not.

In regard to the extra allowances on the Southern route, great benefit had resulted in consequence; and, if it should be found that the allowance was not more than the additional services rendered were worth, then he thought no one ought to complain. It was not treating the head of the Post Office Department fairly, to take up the original contract for 5,000 dollars, made four years ago, when it was believed that would have been sufficient accommodation, and because three, four, or five thousand dollars additional had been given for extra services rendered, he was to be censured! Senators ought to look at the terms of the original contract, and see what the services rendered were, then they should inquire whether there were sufficient reasons to increase the mail accommodations, and, if so, they ought to say, whether or not the extra allowances made were too much for the services rendered. When the report should be laid before the Senate, he would be willing to go into an examination of the matter with any honorable Senator.

Mr. TYLER said, his principal object in rising, was to make one or two inquiries of the chairman of the Post Office committee [Mr. GRUNDY.] It was now several months advanced in the session; the public had heard some startling rumors respecting the condition of the General Post Office, and a most important communication had been received from the Postmaster General, which had not yet been acted on. The public had been looking, as he had been, very anxiously, from day to day, for information from the committee on that subject. He begged now to know from the honorable chairman, what was the condition of that Department? what progress the committee had made in their report? and what impediment was in the way of their completing it? He did not mean to say that there was any impediment in the way at all; but all he wanted to know was, when the Senate was to expect the information that all were so anxiously looking for on this most important subject.

Mr. LEIGH asked the honorable Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GRUNDY] if he had discovered and could explain the reasons for there being so many starry coruscations hanging over Virginia? [Referring to the asterisks attached to contractors' names.]

Mr. GRUNDY replied, that Virginia had always more stars than any other State in the Union, and therefore he was not a little surprised that any Virginian should be startled at it. He would tell the gentleman from Virginia that he was not very well prepared to debate the question at present, but hoped that he should be a few days hence. Now, he would answer the other Senator from Virginia, [Mr. TYLER,] that he did not question the right of any gentleman to inquire how far every member of the committee had done his duty. But the Senate might be assured of one thing, that the greatest diligence would be exercised, from the present time till the end of the session, in order to obtain a full, fair, and impartial exposition of the state of the Post Office Department. To say at what stage the committee had now arrived, was a very difficult thing. If the Senate had passed the resolution offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. EWING,] and he hoped it would be adopted to-day, the committee might have progressed more rapidly. He could assure the gentleman (and he believed he could speak for the whole committee) that they would proceed until every thing was known which it was desirable to know, and more perhaps than the honorable Senator from Virginia would wish.

Mr. CLAYTON said, that it seemed to be the general opinion, and was even now conceded by the honorable chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, [Mr. GRUNDY,] that an inquiry into the condition of the Post Office Department ought to be instituted. Yet the chairman had done nothing towards effecting the object which was admitted to be so desirable, nor had any one attempted it until the Senator from Ohio, ten days ago, offered his resolution, which would, he supposed, be acted upon to-day. The chairman now expresses the opinion, that no such inquiry can be made in less than three or four months, and as the session will probably not endure for that length of time, he was bound to infer that, in the opinion of the chairman, the motion for inquiry would be now useless.

Sir, I felt it to be my duty so early as the session of 1830, '31, to move the appointment of a committee to examine the affairs of this Department, and although that committee, appointed by the Chair, was composed of a majority of the decided friends of the administration, whose measures tended to prevent a full examination, yet enough was elicited to satisfy me that the Department was bankrupt at the end of the second year from the time its present head commenced his administration of its concerns, and I expressed that opinion at the time. You may remember, sir, how severely I was rebuked by a certain class of newspapers for expressing that opinion at that period. It was declared to be impossible: for it was known and said, that when Mr McLean left the Department it was in a most flourishing condition, and that in his report for November, 1827, being his last before he left the office, he had stated, that "the surplus funds exceeded $370,000; that the means of the Department are ample to meet the reasonable wants of the country, and that a vigilant administration of its affairs, for a few years to come, will place at the disposition of the Government an annual surplus of more than half a million of dollars!" In that very year, although Mr McLean augmented the transportation of the mail more than 463,000 miles, yet the surplus of revenue, for the same period, was $100,312!

Now, sir, what has happened in consequence of making the Postmaster General a cabinet minister, and subjecting the control of his Department to the will of a party? Why, the former incumbent, unwilling to be answerable for the consequences of making the office a party machine, having been removed to the bench, the office, instead of yielding an annual surplus revenue to the Treasury of half a million, or any other sum, has been an annual charge upon it, as your appropriations for "contingent expenses" show, of about $80,000, and with all this aid from the Treasury, it is now conceded to be insolvent to the amount of hundreds of thousands of dollars.

We are now asked, why is this? Sir, this question would have been answered in 1830—'31, had the committee, appointed to ascertain it, even under all disadvantages, been permitted to proceed with the inquiry. But, after that investigation had commenced, and while a witness was under examination on this very subject, the Senator from Tennessee procured a vote of the Senate confining the powers of the committee, and, under the pretext at the inquiry tended to disclose impeachable matter, restricting the whole examination, that the further prosecution of it has ever since been deemed useless by those who were most anxious to answer this question. When that inquiry commenced, there were then, as now, professions of perfect willingness to encounter it; but as soon as the oath of a witness showed where the exposure could be made, the inquiry was immediately suppressed. I have stated, by a party vote. The very question as put in writing to the Postmaster General himself, by the committee, on the 24th of December, 1830, "What are the improvements, or other causes which have produced the increased expenditure of 150,000 dollars more than was expended last year?"—and no answer was ever given to it. No, sir, nor until the very close of that season, did he notice the inquiry, when he returned for answer, that this question "could not be answered this season, for want of time!" I refer you, sir, to his own letter of the first of March, 1831. It may happen again, sir, at the same, or a similar question, will not be answered by the same officer in the same length of time.

The honorable chairman objects to the remarks of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. LEXEN] on the subject of Post Office expenditures; is unwilling himself to make, and opens to hear no others make, what he is pleased to term de bene esse speeches on this matter. The Senator from Virginia, finding the "Blue Book" on his desk, looks, very naturally, to every thing there which concerns Virginia, and finds the columns of "Mail Contractors" crowded with asterisks, designating enormous extra allowances to certain mail contractors on the Virginia routes. Sir, the Senator has hit, at the first blow, the principal cause of the most improper expenditure of the funds of this Department, and, if the chairman will not agree to make speeches, on data similar to that from which the Senator from Virginia has drawn his information, he is like to make no speeches, de bene esse or otherwise—no, sir, none, of any kind, on this interesting subject.

The part of the Blue Book from which the gentleman from Virginia read to us, was supplied by the Post Office Department, and is an official document. It exhibits the fact, that not in Virginia only, but throughout the Union, enormous extra allowances have been given to mail contractors, entirely disproportioned to the extra service contracted for, and in direct violation of the law which provides that all such allowances shall be apportioned pro rata to the original allowance. If, for instance, the mail, by the original contract, be carried from Washington to Baltimore in five hours, for 1,800 dollars, an extra service contracted for, to carry it through in half an hour sooner should be paid by one-tenth of the original allowance, 180 dollars, and not 2,000. These extra allowances, appearing on the Postmaster General's own returns to this Senate, cannot be explained consistently with this palpable construction of the law. Sir, it is my duty also to state, that the returns from the Department, on this subject, have not heretofore received credit from the Senate, and to add that the committee has been informed by an officer of the Treasury, that the Comptroller's office now exhibits no check on any statement which may come from the Post Office. By law, it has been provided that the original contracts, as well as true statements of these extra allowances, shall be sent to the Treasury. Not choosing to rely alone on the Post Office statements, a member of the committee, a few weeks since, offered a resolution calling on the Secretary of the Treasury for the information on this subject which his office contained.

A day or two ago, a clerk in the Department called on me to inform me that three-fourths of all these papers were burnt in the late conflagration of the Treasury buildings. The important, the only, check which the law had provided to enable Congress to detect errors in the statements of the Department itself on this subject is, therefore, gone. I understand, also, sir, that the papers which remain, exhibit no returns of extra allowances; so that the duty of transmitting them to the Treasury, though enjoined on the Post Office Department by law, has not been complied with. The chairman will, therefore, perceive, that, on this subject, he can furnish my honorable friend from Virginia with no better or other information than that on which he has rested his statement of these abuses; and whether the honorable chairman be pleased with what he terms these "de bene esse" speeches upon it or not, he will probably be able to make no other himself.

But I may be asked, why implicit confidence may not be placed in the statements of the Department itself on this point? If it were, the statements, as they are actually made, would condemn it for a violation of the law regulating these allowances. But I answer the question at once, by saying, that, on the face of the statement in the Blue Book, there are many allowances not carried out, and that a former return on this subject has been discredited by the unanimous vote of this honorable body. Let us briefly recur to a part of the history of the past. At the session of 1829, a gentleman now in my eye, then a Senator on this floor from Ohio, [Mr. BURRITT], offered a resolution, which was adopted, calling on the Department for a full and accurate statement of the extra allowances to mail contractors, and by whom those allowances were made. No answer was returned to this call, until February, 1831. It was doubtless found to be a troublesome resolution. At length the document, so long expected, was paraded on the Secretary's table, and was referred, not to the investigating committee—no, sir—but to the safe-keeping of the honorable chairman of the standing committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

On the 22d of that month, a few days only before the close of the session, the chairman reported it, and the Senate knowing nothing of its contents, on his motion ordered it to be printed. I glanced my eye over it, and found among other things there, by the help of a friend, that the statements of the most extravagant of the extra allowances had, in some thirty or forty instances, undergone erasure; and, although the operations had been most delicately and curiously performed, it was, on investigation, ascertained that the name of the person who really made the allowances (William T. Barry, namely) had been scratched out, and that of an Assistant Postmaster General under Mr. McLean's administration substituted for it. It appeared also that the report entirely evaded and omitted to answer this call expressly made for the additional services of contractors. The man most injured by the misstatement of this official report, applied to the Senate for redress, and the Senate did, by a unanimous vote, rescind the order for printing the documents, on the ground that a report, thus discredited in so many instances, was creditable in none. Yet we are now, by the burning of the Treasury buildings, deprived of all other statements than those coming from the same source from which this document proceeded.

Sir, I can no otherwise answer the question of the honorable Senator from Virginia, why the stars shine so brilliantly at this time over his honored State, than by telling him that, in my opinion, at this juncture, her vote is held in great demand, and that he will find similar constellations appearing over other parts of the Union, always periodically before any important election in the favored quarter. Yes, sir, I must give it as my most conscientious conviction, when the inquiry is thus made of me, however unpleasant the duty, after no little pains taken to consider the concerns of this Department, that no confidence whatever is to be reposed in its political integrity. Sir, I have none—none whatever. It has not only been removed from office more than a thousand officers and agents, for the crime of thinking differently on one subject from those who removed them; and, in many instances, it has substituted, for those removed, persons notoriously incompetent for the performance of their duties. It has sunk the public revenue which Mr. McLean left in its keeping, and in five years it acknowledges its bankruptcy, assumes a responsibility never conferred upon it by any law, and borrows, without asking the consent of Congress, hundreds of thousands of dollars; thus, without any warrant of law, mortgaging the revenue for all time to come, to defray its expenditures. It was bankrupt before the last Presidential election; yet, for political effect, it was then proclaimed to be in a most flourishing condition, and by a majority of the people the story was accredited. The last report shows, that the amount of its secret service money, called by the Postmaster General "the incidental expenses" of the Department, for the year commencing on the 30th of June, 1832, and ending on the 30th of June, 1833, amounted to $87,701 61—a greater amount of secret service money than was ever before expended pending any Presidential election, or before or after it, in the same length of time. Of the items which constitute this expenditure for secret service money, no return, be it understood, is required of the Department; and the amount of it resting not on legal appropriations, but on Executive discretion, may be any sum the Postmaster General may choose to employ. The attempt now made to account, in part, for the fallen condition of its funds, by proclaiming an incredible increase of mail facilities, will, by investigation, be shown to be another failure.

We hear much, sir, of the power of the bank in debate here. But the power of this single Department over the elections of the country, is greater than that of the institution so much abused for the possession of power, and of all the other Departments of this Government combined. It disburses annually more than $2,000,000. It feels no responsibility to Congress, nor to any human power, but the Executive—the will of its chief, who is, like all his subordinates, removable at the will of the President only. It is a vast political corporation, trading on the revenue of the public, without any control but the will of one man. Yes, sir, one man is President, directors, and company. His agents, consisting of more than ten thousand postmasters, and an almost countless host of mail contractors, clerks, and other functionaries, either secret or public, concerned in the transportation of the mail, watching every avenue by which public or private intelligence is conveyed among thirteen millions of people, has been estimated as a well-disciplined Executive corps of more than twenty thousand men; each, be it repeated and remembered, liable to be cashiered or dismissed at any moment at the will of one man. In despite of the admonitions of Mr. Jefferson to the contrary, who said he would not suffer any printer to be in any way concerned even in carrying the mail, it has connected itself by an intimate association with the public press. The jobs for certain public advertisements issued by it, and other contracts for printing, the value of which a printer well understands, are paid for, not by appropriations from the Treasury, but out of the secret service fund, at the discretion of one man. From the same fund, secret agents, employed to travel up and down the country incog., are paid at the discretion of one man. This fund is, as I have stated, liable to be increased to any amount, at the will of the same man. In his last report, his estimate for it this year is $90,000. The number of his agents is limited by no law. He can this day, if he choose to do so, create fifty new clerks, with salaries, to be appointed by himself. He has increased, and he may again increase, the amount of any man's compensation in his employment, at his sovereign will and pleasure. Every mail contractor is in his power.

If he incur his displeasure, and have missed a single trip, it is a forfeiture which may or may not be taken advantage of, as his employer pleases. The fear of punishment is made auxiliary to the hope of reward, and the only real check known to the head of the Department is to be found in the amount of the public income. Every other Department must ask an appropriation from Congress before it can expend sixpence; while this Department of the Post Office, detached from the Treasury, receiving its revenue from a direct tax on the intelligence and literature of the country, expends more than two millions annually, without asking the consent of Congress to the expenditure of any part of it, and without rendering or publishing any other statement of the receipts and expenditures, than is to be found in its annual report of three or four pages, never condescending to give any particulars, but dealing altogether in sweeping generalities, embracing hundreds of thousands of dollars in an item. If the idea of the gentleman who has this day told us that the Treasury is not in the vaults of the bank, but wherever the public money may be, is sound, it will be difficult to reconcile this immense expenditure, without appropriation, with that provision in the constitution, that no money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in consequence of appropriations made by law. Still more difficult will it be to reconcile the practice of this Department with that other provision, that a regular statement and account of the receipts and expenditures of all public money shall be published from time to time. Sir, I have thought, and now believe, that the spirit of the constitution, as well as the expediency of the measure, requires of us the adoption of a plain remedy for the evils to which I have pointed your attention. This Department should be, as every other is, by law, subjected to the control of Congress; its funds, when received, like all other public money, should be deposited, in the first instance, in the Treasury, and remain there until withdrawn by appropriations made by law. Congress would then be furnished with annual estimates of the accruing expenditure, and complete publicity would then be given to all the accounts of the office. Until this be done, this Department, ungoverned by the representatives of the people, will look above all legal restraints, and continue to use power with reference to party objects.

I think, sir, the honorable chairman is entitled to credit for his proposition on the files of this session, to compel the Department to publish annually, the items of its expenditures. Publicity, once fairly given to the mode of disbursing this portion of the public money, will go far, very far, sir, towards restraining the profligate exercise of power. It is one of the remedies which I suggested three years ago, for the then existing waste of the public money. It is the only control provided in England against the abuse of power on the part of the Bank of England, and it is deemed all-sufficient there. But such is the power of this Department, so far does it exceed that of any banking corporation whatever, that it can never be subjected to a proper responsibility until it shall be annually brought under the supervision and restraint of Congressional action.

In the year 1826, an honorable member from Missouri, now in my eye, [Mr. BAXTER,] made a report on Executive patronage, in which he very eloquently described the immense power of this Department, designating it as one of the two "great moving causes of human action," in this country. I am sorry that his report should not be more frequently remembered and read at this period. In my humble opinion, this Department, irresponsible as it is, wielding without check an increasing annual revenue of between two and three millions, and riding over all the restraints of law, is capable of making any man President of the United States, whose chances are not generally considered to be absolutely desperate before the ontest begins. With chances in his favor approaching o probability of success, the influence of such an engine could ordinarily secure his election in despite of opposition. Applied, as it may easily be and often has been, o the defeat of candidates for office in the several States, its influence will continue to be, as it has been, felt by every man before the people at an election opposed by the Federal Executive. Bearing thousands of free newspapers into every section of the country, and receiving, as it now does, regular periodical returns of all papers taken at every post office in the United States, with the names of all the subscribers to newspapers in every part of the country—thus, I say, maintaining, as it effectually is, a complete system of espionage over the political reading of every man in the whole nation, watching, as it may, private correspondence, and closing, as it may, pretended mistakes, the channels of communication at its pleasure—it is, as now organized, considered to be one of the most dangerous powers ever suffered to exist in a representative government. It is indeed an anomaly. Sir, here is nothing resembling it in the annals of any other government which has deserved the name of free.

I give my opinion to the honorable chairman, that his proposition to check this power is inadequate; and I trust that he will yet give us his influence, with his friends in the other House, to place all this portion of the public money under the care of Congress, and to organize the Department into separate bureaux, each subject to its own head, responsible and accountable for all that may be done in his division. As to the pretence now set up, that the insolvency of the whole concern is to be attributed to its unusual increase of mail facilities—sir, it is the old excuse, the fallacy of which was easily proved three years ago, and will be as easily proved again.

Mr. GRUNDY regretted exceedingly to take up any more of the time of the Senate at that moment; but when necessity compelled a man to act, he needed no excuse or so doing. Some of the principles laid down by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. CLAYTON] met with his hearty assent. He had laid down for himself this rule, with regard to the Post Office Department: to leave as little to its discretion as circumstances would justify; to leave no more to its discretion than would enable it to carry on its operations beneficially to the country. That was his rule. Whenever the Senator from Delaware should bring forward a proposition, calculated to produce that desirable result, it should have his hearty concurrence. He did not wish the Senator to be discouraged with regard to the burning of the Post Office papers, at the conflagration of the Treasury Department. He did not wish the public to believe, that, because those papers were destroyed, the Senate could not obtain full light and information with regard to all the affairs of the Department. What papers, he asked, had been destroyed? Why, the original contracts. Now, suppose every contract entered into by the Department, from its establishment to the present day, had been destroyed, where would have been the evil resulting from it?

There were ample means in the Department itself of obtaining every information with regard to these contracts—whenever made, they were recorded on the books of the Department, and they were there easily to be referred to. Could gentlemen entertain any fears on such a matter as this? Why, if we cannot obtain the original contracts, (said Mr. G.) we can readily obtain extracts, which will answer the same purpose. From extracts we can ascertain the regular contract prices for carrying the mails, and the extra allowances paid; therefore the public ought not to be made to believe that prices had been paid, and extra allowances granted, that the Senate had no means of ascertaining. We shall not, it is true, (said Mr. G.) have as full information in one particular, as if we were in possession of the original contracts; for, by comparing these with the record, we could see whether the clerks had made any mistakes in transcribing. This was all the advantage that could be obtained from the original papers. He could not, with the Senator from Delaware, go back for three or four years, and quote the arguments of gentlemen on that floor; but he had a distinct remembrance of some things, and could remind the Senate of the time when his friend from Kentucky, and others, contended that the Post Office Department was rich, and therefore wanted newspapers to be transported in the mails free of postage, breaking down the post-coaches, eating up the revenues of the Department, and reducing it to the embarrassed situation that gentlemen now say it is in. On the one hand, it was said that the Department was rich—and on the other hand, it was contended that it was bankrupt. But, had the bill to transport newspapers and pamphlets, free of postage, passed both Houses of Congress, then the prediction of the gentleman from Delaware, as to the bankruptcy of the Department, would have been verified.

But this case of Mr. Abraham Bradley had been revived again; and what was it? Why, two young men, clerks in the Department, charged Mr. Bradley as having made extra allowances to some mail contractors; which extra allowances were, in fact, made by Mr. Barry, after he came into office; and that was all. The mistake was unintentionally made, and was soon rectified. But, with regard to the printing of the voluminous report, there were 1,300 or 1,400 bonds, and he thought then, as he thought now, that it would be a useless and unnecessary expense to print them, and he therefore opposed it. There was one opinion expressed by the Senator from Delaware, in which he heartily concurred. It was this: there was more power in the Post Office Department than in any department of the Government. He referred to the Departments of State, of the Treasury, of War, and of the Navy, as compared to the Post Office Department. The Post Office had more power than the other departments, because it had more persons in its employment; but, notwithstanding all this, he did not believe that its power extended to the making of a President. Again: he heard of the vast number of clerks employed in the Department. Now, several years ago, he had held up a list of these clerks by this same Mr. Bradley, who gave them their political characters. A majority of them were against, instead of being in favor, of the administration. He did not pretend to know the political characters of all the deputy postmasters; but from his position, as chairman of the Post Office committee, he ought to know some of them. Who was the postmaster at Albany, the metropolis of the great State of New York? He certainly was not a friend of the Executive. Was the postmaster at the city of New York friendly to the administration? He believed not. And who was the postmaster at Richmond? Why he was a gentleman that, to his knowledge, was every way fitted to fill the duties of his office, though he was not a friend of the administration; and perhaps if you examine into the list of the deputy postmasters, (said Mr. G.) you will find that two-thirds of them, instead of being friends of the administration, will turn round the other way. He, therefore, did not go for the political characters of the postmasters; he did not think it a matter of consequence what were their political opinions, provided they fulfilled their duties; he turned to Mr. Bradley, and, from his account, was satisfied that a majority were opposed to the administration.

He (Mr. G.) had a few remarks more, as unpleasant for him to make, situated as he was, as for the Senate to hear. It had been said, that the Postmaster General could make additional clerks at his pleasure. Well, that was true, very true. In consequence of the frequent calls made on the Department by Congress, it was necessary for it to have additional assistance, to enable it to respond to those calls. Now, (said Mr. G.) if you make these calls on the Postmaster General, you ought to make appropriations for additional clerks, to furnish the information you call for, or else raise no objection to his employing them himself—for when these calls were made, he was brought to the alternative, either of neglecting them, or of employing additional clerks. He (Mr. G.) was for eviscerating this Department, and exposing the whole interior of it to the American people; but, in order to do so, additional clerks must be employed, either by an appropriation of Congress, or by the exercise of the discretionary power of the Postmaster General. But the Senator from Delaware had spoken of contingent expenses and incidental expenses of the Post Office Department, of which the Senate had no knowledge.

Now, as far as he (Mr. G.) had any knowledge on the subject, he was willing to give it. The Postmaster General, then, had given no information with regard to these incidental expenses; and why? Because there was no law requiring him to do so, and no Postmaster before him had ever given any such information. He did not like to speak of the bill he had introduced into the Senate—but if gentlemen should think proper to pass it, the Postmaster General would then be required to give an account at the commencement of every session, of all the expenses of his office, incidental or otherwise. He had no doubt but that the Senator from Delaware would approve of this bill; he believed it would operate beneficially, though perhaps it was not the best that could be framed. With regard to these incidental expenses, he thought, in speaking of them, they ought to distinguish between an improper omission of the Postmaster General to communicate them to Congress, and the absence of any law or usage requiring him to do so. We ought not (Mr. G. said) to find fault with the Postmaster General, for not sending in an account of the incidental expenses of his office, when no Postmaster General ever did give such accounts.

Mr. G. concluded by saying he had gone further into the debate than he intended when he rose; he had wished to refrain, in consequence of the relation in which he stood as chairman of the committee; and he would not have risen at all, had he not felt himself called on. He hoped the Senator from Delaware would have an opportunity of obtaining all the information he desired.

Mr. EWING said, that the observations of the honorable chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads called for some reply on his part. It is now three or four weeks, said Mr. E., since we called on the Treasury Department for information respecting mail contracts and extra allowances, which, by law, are to be deposited there within a short time after they shall have been made. It was not until last evening that any information was given us on that subject, and we were then informed that the papers relating to that subject had been nearly all consumed, and among those that remained no extra allowances appeared to have been reported. The clerk who gave the information, for it was merely verbal, stated, also, that those allowances appear only in pencil marks in the books, or on the copies of the contracts in the Post Office Department. This, sir, is truly a most startling fact. Those extra allowances appear on the Blue Book to the amount of nearly four hundred thousand dollars; have been made by that Department, which is rendered insolvent by the waste and extravagance of those who control it, and they have avoided the only check which the law imposes upon them, by neglecting to report to the Treasury Department; and the whole matter stands in pencil marks only on them, in a situation to be altered or obliterated, as may best suit the views of those who have access to them.

But the honorable chairman tells us, that, notwithstanding this deficiency in the papers in the Treasury Department, we can still get all the information we desire from the General Post Office, and that we should refrain from injurious remarks until that information is received. Sir, the prospect held out to us by the honorable chairman is a very dull one. He has just informed the Senate that the information called from the Post Office already will occupy twenty clerks for four months. How long will it take them when this also is added? There seems to be but little hope of hearing from them within the present session.

Mr. GRUNDY. We will go ourselves and examine them.

Mr. EWING. If the papers are so voluminous, and such the confusion of the Department, that twenty clerks cannot answer our call in four months, what hope is there that we, with all the skill of the honorable chairman to aid us, can, in the few hours that we can snatch from our legislative duties, and the necessary attention to these claims which our constituents have upon us, perfect the investigation, expose the existing abuses, or remove those prejudices which exist against the conduct of the Department?

The honorable chairman says he is disposed to throw open wide the doors of investigation—perhaps a little too wide to lead to a speedy result. When I offered the resolution for information from the Treasury Department, I wished the examination to extend back to the time that the present incumbent was placed at the head of the Post Office Department. The honorable chairman moved to amend by extending the inquiry back four years farther, for no other purpose, I presume, but merely to forward the investigation. The consequence has been that we have got no information at all, and are likely to get none. Should he in the same manner continue, when we get into the Department, to open wider and wider the doors for investigation, the consequence may be, that he may wholly baffle and defeat that inquiry which he most anxiously desires to facilitate. I do not think the honorable chairman's explanation is entirely correct as to the erased and altered paper which made its appearance in response to the call made by my respected predecessor in the Senate. It was not a mistake of two young men, inserting wrong names on the paper. I was present at the time, "a looker-on in Venice," and recollect it well. The young men had made the entries right, but some one who superintended in the Department directed the true name to be erased, and another name to be inserted, the effect of which was to cast an imputation of perjury on a gentleman who had testified to some fact relating to the Department. When the fraud was detected, the order to print the document was rescinded by a unanimous vote of the Senate.

Mr. CLAYTON confirmed the statement of Mr. Ewing, and said, that a reference to the debate of the Senate at the time of rescinding the order to print the report of the Postmaster General, would show that the Senate from Tennessee was entirely mistaken. The honorable Senator, and every other then present, concurred in the vote to rescind, because the report was false in some of its most important statements. Sir, I now hold the Journal of the Senate for 1831 in my hand; from which it appears that, on the 22d of February in that year, the gentleman from Tennessee reported these abstracts of extra allowances; and that, on his own motion, the Senate ordered them to be printed. They had been in his care for several weeks, and with a full knowledge of the number of sheets contained in them, and the full means of estimating the cost of printing, he had recommended the Senate to print them, as appears by the record. Will he now say that, at the time of rescinding the order to print, which was done by a unanimous vote, only a week after the adoption of his motion, he had changed his mind, because he had then, for the first time, discovered how many pages were to be printed? No, sir, the honorable Senate voted with us all, because the report was not to be relied on. He has forgotten the reason on which his own vote rested. He would see, from the Journal, how easily a man may be mistaken as to the grounds on which the Senate has acted. As to the statements of political opinions of officers of the Department, and other suggestions of the chairman, he might avail himself of another opportunity, when a debate should arise more appropriate and relevant to the question before the Senate, to reply to them. For the present, he should forbear, that the Senate might refer the memorial.

The question was then taken, and the memorial was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

CHESAPEAKE AND OHIO CANAL.

Mr. KENT rose and addressed the Senate as follows: Mr. President: I received, a few days since, from the Governor of Maryland, a resolution passed by the legislature of that State, which I rise for the purpose of presenting to the Senate. It enjoins upon my colleague and myself the duty to "use our best exertions to obtain from Congress such a liberal appropriation of the public funds, in aid of the further construction of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal, as shall ensure its completion;" and I take great pleasure in presenting this resolution to the Senate, because the legislature of Maryland have not approached Congress before they had done something themselves to the purpose. They have not prayed to Hercules without first putting their shoulder to the wheel. They have made a further subscription to that great and important work, and they rely on Congress to enable the Government of the United States, who is a joint stockholder with Virginia and Maryland, to do so likewise, and I look forward with confidence, that, when the proper period arrives, the Senate will not disappoint them.

The resolution was received and read, and referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

GOLD AND SILVER CURRENCY.

Mr. BENTON submitted the following resolution, which was ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed on the part of the Senate, jointly with such committee as may be appointed on the part of the House of Representatives, to consider and report to the Senate, and to the House, respectively, what alterations, if any, are necessary to be made—

1st. In the value of the gold coined at the mint of the United States, so as to check the exportation of that coin, and to restore it to circulation in the United States.

2d. In the laws relative to foreign coins, so as to restore the gold and silver coin of foreign nations to their former circulation within the United States.

3d. In the joint resolution of 1816, (for the better collection of the revenue,) so as to exclude all bank notes under twenty dollars, from revenue payments, after a given period, and to make the revenue system of the United States instrumental in the gradual suppression of the small note circulation, and the introduction of gold and silver for the common currency of the country.

After the transaction of some other business, the Senate then, on motion of Mr. WRIGHT, proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and, when the doors were opened,

The Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, MARCH 31.

NORTH CAROLINA MEMORIALS.

Mr. MANGUM presented a memorial from the town of Wilkesborough, in North Carolina. He stated that the memorial from the same town, which he presented some days ago, prayed for the restoration of the deposits, but was against the re-charter of the bank. The present memorial prayed also for the restoration of the deposits, but said nothing on the subject of the re-charter of the bank. The memorial was read, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. M. also presented the preamble and resolutions adopted at a meeting of the citizens of Mountsville, in the county of Rowen, North Carolina, praying for the restoration of the deposits; which was also referred to the same committee, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. M. also presented a memorial signed by 500 citizens of Beaufort, North Carolina, praying for the restoration of the deposits. He stated that this county had heretofore been remarkable for its attachment to the administration. He presented, also, a series of resolutions adopted at a public meeting of the citizens of the county. The memorial and resolutions were also referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

MOBILE MEMORIAL.

Mr. KING presented a memorial from citizens of Mobile. He presented this memorial with pleasure, because it was couched in respectful terms, and states, no doubt truly, the condition of that city. He was personally acquainted with a majority of the signers of the memorial, who were generally merchants and citizens of the highest standing, and who had met and adopted the memorial without distinction of party. They stated that they were not carried away by party considerations, or a disposition to promote political objects. They stated that the city of Mobile, and the State of Alabama, had been in a state of progressive prosperity, until within the last four or five months, when it was suddenly checked. They complained of the unsettled state of the exchange, which they ascribed, in part, to the removal of the deposits. In consequence of the pressure, the city of Mobile had suffered a diminution of trade to the amount of a million of dollars. These memorialists represented that they had no interest in the United States Bank, and they asked of Congress to adopt such measures of relief as, in their wisdom, they might deem expedient. The memorial was referred to the Committee on Finance.

UNION BANK OF MARYLAND.

On motion of Mr. CLAY, the following resolution, offered by him some days since, was taken up for consideration:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to the Senate what amount of public money is now on deposit in the Union Bank of Maryland, and on what account it was deposited; and whether any Treasury drafts, contingent or other, have been, during the month of March, 1834, furnished to the said bank, to enable it to meet any demands which might be made upon it."

Mr. C. then modified his resolution to read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to the Senate what amount of public money is now on deposit in the Union Bank of Maryland, when or on what account it was deposited; and also, whether any Treasury drafts, contingent or other, have been, during the month of March, 1834, furnished to the said bank, or at any time heretofore, to the Bank of Maryland, for any and what purpose. And that he likewise report what amount of stock in the capital of said Union Bank was held by R. B. Taney, Esq., when the said bank was selected as one of the banks to receive in deposit the public money, and what amount of the said stock he now holds.

The resolution, as modified, was then agreed to.

ALBANY MEMORIAL.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, the Senate took up for consideration the memorial of the citizens of Albany,

SENATE.]

Albany Memorial.

which was laid on the table on motion of Mr. WEBSTER; when

Mr. WRIGHT rose and said he had felt the greatest reluctance against entering into these incidental debates upon the presentation of memorials; that he was fully aware that the patience of the Senate had become justly fatigued with them; and he could say, with truth, that he was not the least impatient at their continuance, to the exclusion of the ordinary legislative business of the body. Yet the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] when presenting this memorial, had considered it his duty to accompany the presentation with some remarks, and the expression of certain opinions in relation to the business of Albany and its vicinity, and indeed of the whole State of New York, which made it the imperative duty of those representing that State here to reply. Mr. W. said he would first take a brief notice of the facts stated in relation to the memorial. The honorable Senator had informed us that it was signed by the names of 2,800 persons, and that he was authorized, by the very respectable committee who were the bearers of the paper to Congress, to say, that great pains had been taken that the name of no person should be signed to the memorial who was not a resident of the city of Albany, and a legal voter in that city. He was further authorized to say, that the committee believed that the whole 2,800 persons who had signed the memorial, were legal voters of Albany; and that, if an exception existed, it had been a mistake, and was without their knowledge. It is not my purpose, said Mr. W., to dispute these statements. I have not seen the names signed to the memorial; and if I had, my personal acquaintance with the voters of Albany, would not enable me to say, to any considerable extent, whether the persons whose signatures may be there found, are or are not residents and voters. Mr. W. said he had had the pleasure of a personal acquaintance, more or less extensive, with several of the members of the committee to which this memorial had been intrusted for presentation here; indeed, he had found all the members of that committee, whom he had had the pleasure to see since their arrival in this city, personal acquaintances; and it gave him sincere gratification to be able, most cheerfully, to accord to them all the respectability, and character for truth, which the honorable Senator had so justly claimed for them. He must be distinctly understood upon this point; and he spoke with the more freedom, because he knew that several, at least, of those respectable gentlemen were in his hearing. He had not intended, nor did he intend, to say, or intimate, that the committee had stated any fact, or expressed any opinion, to the honorable gentleman they had selected to present their memorial, which they had not persuaded themselves to believe. He did not himself believe they intended to authorize any statements which might produce erroneous impressions or injurious consequences. He considered them incapable of entertaining such a design. Still, Mr. President, said Mr. W., as I intimated on a former day, I have received, with instructions to present to the Senate, another memorial from the inhabitants of Albany, said to be signed by 1,700 names, and in relation to which I have assurances, from sources equally respectable, and equally entitled to credit with any portion of this committee, that the same care was used to obtain the names of citizens only to this paper. So much confidence of entire success is not expressed; but the persons who transmit it to me, confidently believe that full 1,600 of the 1,700 names, are citizens and voters. The honorable Senator told us that the highest vote ever given in the city of Albany, was a little short of 3,800, and, therefore, he says, it will be seen that this memorial represents full three-fourths of the voting population of that city. I, sir, said Mr. W., was a resident of the city of Albany in the fall of 1832, when this vote was taken, and my impression was, that the whole vote was not far from 3,500, but I doubt not the committee obtained their information from the records, and they have surely intended to state it truly. If, then, there be 3,800 voters in Albany, we have here the names of 2,800 persons upon one memorial, and 1,700 upon another, making an aggregate of 4,500 names from 3,800 voters. This shows demonstratively, that, however rigid may have been the efforts to obtain the names of voters only, very considerable mistakes have been made somewhere; seven hundred names, at least, are upon the one or the other, or both memorials, which are not the names of legal voters of Albany. Mr. W. said he would not pretend to say upon which memorial these names were to be found, or which would present the greatest proportion of these mistakes; he could not say this—he had not the information necessary to enable him to do it; he would not even express an opinion upon the point, further than to say that he did not doubt the mistakes existed to a greater or less extent in both memorials, and that they would not be found exclusively confined to either. That this might be known to those whose opinions and wishes the two memorials expressed, he would, before he resumed his seat, propose so to modify the motion of the honorable Senator who presented the memorial upon the table, as to have the names printed with the paper, and, if the Senate should gratify him in that request, he would then make the same motion in relation to the memorial he held in his hand, and was about to present. The memorials being thus printed with the names, he would cheerfully engage to send a copy of each to any member of the committee they themselves should select, or to any address they should please to indicate to him; and he would also send copies to some one of the gentlemen through whom he had received the memorial intrusted to his care, and, in this way, would do all in his power to enable the citizens themselves to determine the extent to which each memorial represented the legal voters of the city from whence they came. So much for the facts in relation to the memorials.

The honorable Senator [Mr. WEBSTER] had been further authorized by this committee to express certain opinions in relation to the future business of the New York canals and the Hudson river, which he, Mr. W., felt it to be much more important to notice. He would not attempt to express his surprise when he heard those predictions made, and knowing as he did, that the gentlemen did not assume to speak from his own information, but from that derived from this respectable committee, he was, at the time, confidently impressed with the belief that a misunderstanding existed as to the expectations they intended to communicate. From a conversation, however, with some members of the committee, he had ascertained that such was not the fact, and that the Senator had understood correctly, and had correctly expressed, the opinions and expectations communicated to him. He, Mr. W., must therefore believe these respectable gentlemen had permitted themselves to entertain, and to express, opinions on the subject of the future trade of their city and State, without sufficient reflection, either as to the probable accuracy of the opinions expressed, or as to the consequences to follow the establishment, in the public mind, of erroneous impressions in reference to that trade. Sir, the honorable Senator states, as the confident opinion of this committee, that the New York canals would not, for the coming season, do, at the extent, more than one-tenth of their ordinary business. Have these gentlemen, Mr. President, permitted themselves to believe this; and do they intend to make, not only the people of New York, but the people of the whole country, believe it? What is the extent to which this fearful prediction of ruin to that State goes? During the last year the Erie and Champlain canals yielded to the Treasury of New York, on tolls upon persons and property trans-sorted upon them, more than $1,324,000; and do these merchants and business men of Albany, believe that the present year is to see the income of those great works reduced to $132,600? A sum less, by about $100,000, than the cost of keeping them in repair and furnishing their necessary attendance? Sir, the opinion is wild and illu-ory: it will not be realized, and must have been expressed without proper consideration as to the necessary effects and consequences of its diffusion from this hall upon such authority.

[Here Mr. CLAY explained on behalf of Mr. WEBSTER, who was absent, and said he did not think the Senator intended to be understood as saying that this difference in the business of the canals for the whole season was anticipated, but that it was anticipated in the spring business, because there was not, at this time, in store along the canal lines, more than one-tenth of the usual amount of property in preparation for market. Such was his understanding of Mr. WEBSTER's expressions.]

Mr. WRIGHT resumed, by saying that nothing was farther from his intention than to misrepresent the honorable Senator, and he deeply regretted his absence, as it would have been much more pleasant to his feelings to have been able to reply in his hearing. He recollected that the honorable gentleman had stated the fact alluded to, and that it was the only fact he had stated upon which to found his opinion as to the great diminution to be expected in the business of the canals. He did not, however, understand him as confining that anticipated diminution to any period short of the termination of what he strongly represented to be the present distressed state of the country. Such, he, Mr. W., supposed at the time, was the inference the honorable Senator intended to convey; such he knew was the understanding of others, as well as himself, as to the force and tendency of his remarks; and such, it seemed to him, was the necessary construction of the argument, to give it any application to the purpose for which it was used. The object of the memorialists, and of the honorable Senator, he understood to be to prove the necessity of a national bank, and of the restoration of the public deposits to that institution. As one strong ground of the necessity, the effect of a change of those deposits, and of the contemplated close of the Bank of the United States upon the business of the New York canals, was attempted to be shown, and if it was only designed to be understood that that alarming effect was to be experienced while the property in store along the canal lines was being transported, and was then to cease, the argument became one of little force. He would not, in the absence of the honorable Senator, say that this was not his meaning, but he must say that this was not his understanding of it, and it was to guard against the consequences of a belief in the public mind that the business of these canals was destroyed, and was to remain so until the United States Bank should be re-chartered, that he had felt bound to reply to the gentleman's remarks.

Mr. W. said, a former official situation had given him some acquaintance with the business of the New York canals. Those artificial channels of navigation draw their freight from all those portions of the State of New York upon each side of them, and on the north from Vermont, and on the west from Ohio, Michigan, and, to some extent, from other Western States. It is known to all in any degree acquainted with this business, that since it has become settled and regular, and when money is plenty, merchants, forwarders, and, to a greater extent, mill owners, purchase up, during the winter season, a great part of the produce remaining in the country after the close of navigation in the fall, and that considerable competition is usually excited between these purchasers. It is also known that bank facilities and bank accommodations are mainly depended upon for means to make the purchases, and that sufficient time is asked to enable the purchaser to receive from the market the avails of his produce to pay his loans. No one can doubt that these accommodations have been mostly withheld during the winter past, and the necessary consequence must be, that the produce of the country, instead of being now in store, along the lines of the canals, is in the hands of the framers. The cause of this change in this business, during the last five months, cannot require explanation here. It is not that the State banks, from which the means to make these purchases have been formerly obtained, are less rich, or less able to afford them this year than they have been in any former year. They never were so rich and so able as now, but their own safety has compelled them to refuse those extensions in their business which these long loans always require. A great moneyed power exists in the country, which has chosen to place itself in an attitude of open hostility towards the New York banks; and the safety of the community, and of the holders of their paper, as well as their own self-preservation, has compelled them to curtail their business, to draw in their notes in circulation, and to prepare for a blow, which they have abundant evidence has been long intended. But, Mr. President, said Mr. W., this unnatural restraint upon the banks has not annihilated the produce destined for the markets. It is in the country, whether in store or not, and will as surely seek a market as the streams of the country will empty their waters into the ocean. Be it in the hands of the merchant, the forwarder, the mill-owner, or the farmer who produces it, this result must follow. It must find a market, and, in relation to the district of country dependent upon the New York canals as the course of transportation, it will as surely take that course as that their individual interests will continue to govern men of business, unless an impression is suffered to be produced, in this time of excitement and alarm, that the markets, to which that channel will carry the products of our rich country, will reject and loathe them. If that impression is to be settled upon the country, and by the efforts of the merchants and business men, I will not be answerable for the consequences. I pronounce it an unjust conclusion from any existing state of facts. The markets of Albany, Troy, and New York, will, this year, as they have always heretofore, present as ready a sale and as favorable terms for the productions of the country as any other markets to which those productions can be carried. The property brought to those markets is not to rot and perish upon their docks for the want of a purchaser, but it is to find as ready a sale, and at as good a price, as at any other market. The great canals of New York are not to call upon the treasury of that State for means to keep them in a navigable state, but are to continue to pour their rich earnings into that treasury. The business of that great State is not to be suspended, its markets desolated, its fruitful fields abandoned, and its great channels of internal communication rendered useless, for the want, or by the action, of any bank. No, sir, I will not make the humiliating admission, nor can it have been the intention of the respectable committee who hear me, to have produced such an impression. They could not have designed to give a warning to the North and the West not to bring their products to their markets; they could not have designed that it should be said to those who seek a market, Turn your eyes to Philadelphia, or Baltimore, on the South, or to the Canada markets on the North, but send not to us, for we cannot purchase, and your property must remain in our streets without a bidder for it.

Sir, I have looked at the remarks of the honorable Senator who presented this memorial, in their printed form, and they seem to me to carry with them consequences of this description. I protest against their justice and applicability.

SENATE.]

Albany Memorial.

[MARCH 31, 1834.]

Again, said Mr. W., we are told by the honorable Senator, that the Hudson, that proud river of ours, which he has done us the justice to denominate one of the noblest rivers in the world, is also to be abandoned. The sails of its vessels, and the smoke of its steamboats, are no more to meet the eye, but all is to be a scene of widespread ruin. From thirty to thirty-five steam tow-boats, the Senator tells us, found employment upon that river during the last season, and that six or eight (I understood the honorable Senator, when speaking, to say two or three) are at this time adequate to all the calls of commerce. He also pronounced an elegant eulogium upon our passage-boats upon the Hudson, and spoke of them too, as things that were, but which were to be seen no more. I may here again, said Mr. W., be subjected to the interpretation which has been given to the Senator's remarks in reference to the business upon the canals, and it may be said from the language used in the printed report of his observations, that the six or eight steam tow-boats have reference to the wants of commerce at this moment. If this be so, I have no doubt the Senator is above, rather than below the demand; but does he not know, as well as the committee from whom he derived his information, that the commerce of the Hudson does not extend itself until the canals become navigable? Had he not seen, what we have all seen in the public papers, that the 17th of the next month was the earliest day at which the officers having charge of those works, proposed to open them for navigation? Sir, this respectable committee knew these facts if the honorable Senator did not, and they could not have designed that he should speak of the wants of commerce upon the Hudson river, while the canals remain closed by the frost. The produce to be taken to the market cannot reach the river craft during that period, except such portions of it as may remain in the cities of Albany and Troy, at the close of navigation in the fall; and Mr. W. said, he believed he was safe in saying that very little, other than the single article of lumber, was ever suffered so to remain. All was carried to the great market in New York as it arrived and was not kept for the five months of frost and winter in the store-houses. There could not then be down-freight, to any considerable extent, until the canals were opened to bring it to the river. It would be equally useless for the merchant in the country to transport his merchandise from New York to Troy and Albany at this period, for it must remain there in store until the canals are made navigable. Surely, then, it cannot be doing justice to the Senator's argument to suppose that he designed to refer to the wants of commerce on the Hudson river, at this season of the year, to prove the stagnation of business in New York, produced by the want of a bank. No sir, that vivid picture was not drawn for such a period. It was intended for the full life of business, and to show the citizens of that State, and the country, the great change which the measures of the Government had wrought. I say again, said Mr. W., that the respectable gentlemen who hear me, and from whom the honorable Senator derived his impressions, did not sufficiently reflect upon the positions they had assumed, or the consequences to flow from them, before they gave them to their eloquent advocate. The citizens of New York will not recognise their truth and justice, nor will the citizens of Albany admit their applicability to their market town. They must continue to depend upon their industry and business for their living and prosperity, and they will never consent that, to obtain the re-charter of the bank, their shops shall be abandoned, their noble river deserted, their canals made useless, and that trade, which is legitimately theirs, be turned over to rival markets, possessing inferior advantages, and no superior enterprise.

Mr. President, there is another consideration connected with this subject, which I cannot omit to mention.

The citizens of Albany are now humble petitioners to Congress for an appropriation from the money of the Government to improve the navigation of the Hudson river. The individual members of the committee from Albany, and those whom they represent, feel an interest in this application of a peculiar character. The improvement is intimately connected with the growth and prosperity and commerce of their city. Sir, to show that I was not alone in my understanding of the force of the argument of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WABSTER,] as to the destruction of the business upon this river, it was not an hour after he had closed his remarks, that it was said to me in this hall, "If this is to be the state of the business upon the Hudson, your claim for an improvement of the navigation cannot be strong for the present. If a few steam tow-boats only are to navigate that river, you will be able to get along without the aid of a public expenditure." Sir, I pronounce the conclusion wholly erroneous and unjust to those who desire an improvement of that navigation. That great channel of commerce and business is not to be abandoned. The white sails of its coasting vessels, and the regular passing and re-passing of its steamboats, both for towing and passage, are to continue to be seen as usual. I am yet to learn the names of the proprietors of any vessel, or any boat, steam or sail, who are preparing to bind their craft to the docks, to lie there and rot during the coming summer. I venture to say no such case can be named, and we are not to be met, when a bill for improving the navigation of that river shall come from the House to this body, with this argument of the honorable Senator, to prove that the work is unnecessary, and will be useless. I protest against any such application of his facts or conclusions, and I care not from what source he may have derived either.

Mr. President, said Mr. W., I had hoped when I had seen a bill introduced into the Senate to re-charter the Bank of the United States, and when, after a debate of a few days, I had seen that bill placed in quiet repose upon your table, upon the motion of the honorable Senator who offered it to the body, that I should not so soon again have been called upon to debate its principles. The honorable Senator, however, upon the presentation of this memorial from Albany, has considered it to be his duty to enter into this subject, to arraign the conduct of my honorable colleague and myself, as members of the Senate, and to charge us with misrepresenting what have been, from the adoption of the Federal constitution to the present time, the opinions of our State. To prove this grave charge, he recapitulates the history of the action of the national legislature upon the two banks which have been adopted, and sets before us the voice of our own State upon those occasions, as contrary to our course. This makes it my duty to follow the honorable Senator, as briefly as I may, and to see what has, in truth, been the expression of New York at all the periods of our history to which he refers, and from whence that expression has proceeded.

The first reference is made to the charter of the first bank, in 1791, and the Senator names Gen. Schuyler, Egbert Benson, and the late Rufus King, as the members of Congress from New York actively engaged in favor of the bank. Had the gentleman forgotten that the first bank was the peculiar measure of Gen. Hamilton, then at the head of the Treasury, and that Gen. Hamilton was from New York? Had he forgotten that this was one of the great questions which laid the foundation of that division of political parties which has prevailed in this country, with some variation of names, but little variation of principle, from 1791 to the present time? Had he forgotten that Gen. Hamilton, as the distinguished and talented leader of the Federal party, contended for strong powers derived by implication and construction from the constitution, and for a bank of the United States as one of the strongest of those powers? Had he forgotten that Mr. Jefferson, as the head of the anti-Federal party, opposed these doctrines, contended for a strict construction of the constitution, and resisted the bank as one of the most violent encroachments upon the powers granted by that instrument which had been or would be attempted? Had he forgotten that the written opinion of Gen. Hamilton, as a member of the cabinet, was given in favor of the bank bill, and that the opinions of Mr. Jefferson, then Secretary of State, and of Mr. Randolph, then Attorney General, were given against it; and that these were all the opinions given by any members of the cabinet? Had he not heard, what, said Mr. W., I believe the history of the day will show, that the President was induced to yield his assent to the bill, in consequence of the supposed wants and necessities of the public Treasury? The long and expensive war of the revolution had then just closed; a heavy debt was hanging over the country; its credit was depreciated; and, what was still more pressing, expensive Indian wars were in progress, and the means to prosecute them were not within the reach of the Treasury. Did the honorable Senator not also know that the distinguished individuals he had named were also influential Federalists of the State of New York of that day? That they took the side of Gen. Hamilton in the political contest then opening, and that they would, of course, have espoused his great measure of the bank? Mr. W. said he believed it was true that the whole voice of New York, given upon the question of the chartering of the old bank, was given in favor of that bill; that that vote consisted of six in the House and two in the Senate; and that Gen. Schuyler and Mr. King were the Senators from the State at the time, and that Egbert Benson was the leader of the delegation in the House. Such was the action and voice of New York upon that bill, and such, politically, were the men in whose hands the vote of that State was at that period. I do not, said Mr. W., mention any of these men but with the most profound sentiments of respect for their talents and statesman-like qualities. I know well they were second to few men in the country, but I have never been able to bring myself to admire their political principles.

The old bank, Mr. President, said Mr. W., went through its legal term, and its close approached. The honorable Senator says New York was against its re-charter, but that, he adds, "was a party question." Sir, it was a party question, intimately connected with those great principles I have before mentioned, as constituting the grounds of difference between the Federal and anti-Federal or Democratic parties. As such, the question of the re-charter of that first bank was principally contested, and I am happy that the honorable gentleman concedes that New York was found upon the Democratic side of that controversy. She was so found, and her principles were then, and upon that very question, so distinctly avowed as not to remain matter of doubt or question. The venerable and ever-to-be-lamented George Clinton then occupied your chair, sir, and upon him was devolved the unpleasant duty of giving his casting vote upon the bill before this body to re-charter the old bank. That distinguished man, at that day, more than any other, possessed the confidence and affections of the people of his State. The inhabitants of New York, with hearts as full as those of the citizens of any other portion of the country, always most cheerfully yielded to the sainted Washington the endearing title of "the Father of his Country," while, with not less sincerity of feeling and patriotism, they have always considered George Clinton the Washington of New York, the Father of his State. The language of this revolutionary patriot, upon the occasion alluded to, was as follows.

The question was upon striking out the first section of the bill, and the vote of the Senate was 17 for and 17 against the motion. The Senate being equally divided, the President, George Clinton, determined the question in the affirmative, first submitting to the Senate the following prefatory remarks:

"Gentlemen: As the subject on which I am called upon to decide has excited great sensibility, I must solicit the indulgence of the Senate whilst I briefly state the reasons which influence my judgment.

"Permit me to observe that the question to be decided does not depend simply upon the right of Congress to establish, under any modification, a bank, but upon their power to establish a national bank, as contemplated by this bill. In other words, Can they create a body politic and corporate, not constituting a part of the Government, nor otherwise responsible to it but by forfeiture of charter, and bestow on its members privileges, immunities, and exemptions, not recognised by the laws of the States, nor enjoyed by the citizens generally?

"It cannot be doubted that Congress may pass all necessary and proper laws for carrying into execution the powers especially granted to the Government, or to any department or officer thereof; but, in doing so, the means must be suited and subordinate to the end. The power to create corporations is not expressly granted; it is a high attribute of sovereignty, and in its nature not accessorial or derivative by implication, but primary and independent.

"I cannot believe that this interpretation of the constitution will, in any degree, defeat the purposes for which it was formed; on the contrary, it does appear to me that the opposite exposition has an inevitable tendency to consolidation, and affords just and serious cause of alarm.

"In the course of a long life, I have found that Government is not to be strengthened by an assumption of doubtful powers; but by a wise and energetic execution of those which are incontestable; the former never fails to produce suspicion and distrust, whilst the latter inspires respect and confidence. If, however, after a fair experiment, the powers vested in the Government shall be found incompetent to the attainment of the objects for which it was instituted, the constitution happily furnishes the means for remedying the evil by amendments; and I have no doubt that, in such event, on an appeal to the patriotism and good sense of the community, it will be wisely applied.

"I will not trespass upon the patience of the Senate any longer than to say, from the best examination I have been able to give the subject, I am constrained, by a sense of duty, to decide in the affirmative; that is, that the first section of the bill be stricken out."

These are the sentiments of New York in 1811. What are they? That the constitution does not grant to Congress the power to charter a bank; that "government is not to be strengthened by an assumption of doubtful powers; but by a wise and energetic execution of those which are incontestable;" and that, if the constitution does not expressly grant all the power necessary to the protection of the public interests and the safety of public liberty, an appeal should be made to "the patriotism and good sense" of the people; a people who are the source of all power. Are these principles from which my honorable colleague and myself have departed in our action here? No, sir, they are the principles by which we endeavor to govern our conduct; they are the principles of George Clinton, whose name will be remembered and venerated in New York, while the republican principles of Jefferson shall be remembered there.

But, said Mr. W., the honorable Senator has taken us through the period from 1811 to 1816. That, Mr. President, is a period to which, dark and trying as it was in our history, New York may look back with some little pride. The old bank went out of existence in 1811, at a time when the restrictive measures of the Government had locked up the commerce of the country; produced an almost total stagnation of trade; and depressed, in an unexampled degree, the price of property of every description. In June, 1812, came on the war, a war with the most powerful nation upon the earth, and a foreign enemy pressed upon the country from every direction, by the water and the land. Then was a time of pressure indeed, but, did New York complain? What was her course? Did she stop to say, "we must have a national bank?" No, sir, she opened her treasury to the Government, and paid her money to support the war. She extended her credit to raise the means to support the armies of the country. And she turned out her men to take the field against the common enemy. Some of her Eastern sisters then became more rigid constructionists of the constitution than New York has ever been. They then found that their constitutional power to resist the enemies of the country in arms was limited by the geographical line of their own territory. Their bayonet points fell to the ground the moment that line was reached, however formidable the enemy, or however close the pursuit. Not so with New York. She knew no such limit. Her whole energies, and her somewhat strong arm, were fully extended to sustain the country. Her men and her arms leapt her boundaries, and carried that war into the enemy's country. And what course, Mr. President, did her so much abused State banks pursue? They did not boast of their specie payments, and let the credit of the country sink; but, with all the banks of the Middle and Southern States, they yielded their means and extended their credit beyond the bounds of prudence, but not beyond that of patriotism, to sustain the falling credit of the Government. Their bills and their credit clothed and fed the citizen soldiers who were in the field, driving the enemy from their soil, and transferring the desolations of war beyond their borders. At the darkest hour of this period, the whisper of disunion came upon New York from the East. Did she startle or shrink? No, sir. The threat but settled the nerves of her citizens, and breasted them to the trial. She declared the enemies of the Union, whether foreign or domestic, to be her enemies; and prepared herself for any crisis which might be presented. The clouds passed away, and peace was restored to the country. Nor was the advance of New York in wealth and prosperity destroyed. Her citizens felt the importance of the occasion, and they bore their trials with firmness and with confidence; and time has shown them that their hope was well founded.

The honorable Senator, however, now tells us that the important lesson to be learned from the trials of this period, was the necessity of a national bank. Sir, said Mr. W., this is one of the last lessons it did teach, or will teach, to my mind. I am willing to concede that the Government became deeply indebted by the war, that its credit had become considerably depressed; that its currency was degraded; and that the original friends of a national bank pressed upon the country the re-charter of such a moneyed institution, as the only efficient remedy for these great existing evils. The wants and necessities of the public Treasury were the great argument: and I am further willing to admit that all, or nearly all of those republicans who did not entertain constitutional scruples as to the power of Congress to create such an incorporation, yielded to the necessity, and thus produced the present bank.

This charter was granted in 1816, and the honorable Senator says "it is the creature of New York opinions and New York power." I propose, said Mr. W., to examine the facts in relation to this assertion, and to see whether it is well founded upon such an examination. The bill which resulted in the charter of the present Bank of the United States originated in the House of Representatives. Upon the final question upon the bill there, and before it was sent to the Senate, New York gave twenty votes, twelve of which were for and eight against the bill, leaving a majority of four votes from New York in favor of the measure in its then shape. That bill passed the House by a majority of nine votes, as shown by the journal, thus proving that if the New York vote had been wholly withdrawn the bill would have passed by a majority of five votes. So far, then, the bank cannot properly be said to have been "the creature of New York opinions and New York power." The bill went to the Senate and was amended there, and, upon the final vote in that body, both of the New York Senators voted against it. There, then, it surely was not "the creature of New York opinions and New York power." It was returned to the House, and the test question was a motion for the indefinite postponement of the bill. At that period New York had twenty-seven members in the House, of whom twenty-two only appear to have been present and voting, and five did not vote. Of the twenty-two who did vote, fifteen voted against the motion for indefinite postponement, which was for the bank, and seven voted for the motion for indefinite postponement, which was against the bank: thus leaving a majority of eight in the New York vote in favor of the bank. The vote against the indefinite postponement prevailed by a majority of twenty-four, so that if the New York vote here also had been wholly withdrawn, the bank would have succeeded by a majority of sixteen. Is it, then, a proper use of language to say that the present bank is "the creature of New York opinions and New York power," when the whole vote of that State in one branch of Congress, was against it, and when, in the other branch, it only received an indecisive majority of the votes of the delegation from that State? Mr. W. said he thought the honorable Senator had mistaken the facts upon this point, and that the mistake in his conclusion was imputable to that circumstance. So much, said Mr. W., for the former course of New York upon the bank question.

Again, the honorable Senator tells us that the present distressed state of the country proves conclusively the necessity for a national bank. I have before shown, said Mr. W., that the necessities of the public Treasury have, upon all former occasions, been the only necessities which have influenced the action of Congress in the incorporation of a bank. Now, we are officially told by the officer at the head of the Treasury Department, that the convenience even, and certainly the wants or necessities of the Treasury, do not require any such institution. Still its necessity is urged upon us for the convenience of trade, the accommodation of the merchants, and the wants of private business: The honorable Senator entertains the opinion that these wants constitute the necessity required, and that the re-charter of the present bank is the only remedy for the existing evils. In these opinions the signers of the memorial upon the table agree with him; but, said Mr. W., I have, upon a former occasion, said that opinion upon these questions was every thing, and I repeat the remark. The signers of the memorial, also, from Albany, which I hold in my hand, entertain entirely different opinions. They think that the present distress in the money market shows not the want of a bank, but that we have a bank large enough to control the State institutions, and to regulate their business. The one class of these memorialists look to the re-charter of the present bank as the termination of the present troubles. The other class look to the entire destruction of its hope of a re-charter, and a consequent cessation of its hostility towards the State institutions, as the most likely termination of the present distresses of the country, by leaving the State banks at liberty, without danger to themselves from this great and powerful institution, to afford the relief required. Such are the different views of the citizens of the country, as to the causes of the present depressed state of the money market, and as to the appropriate and most efficient mode of relief.

Albany Memorial.

[SENATE.]

The honorable Senator, in further pursuing his train of reasoning, has considered it proper to notice the late message of the Governor of the State of New York to the legislature. In one particular, at least, the member did most manifest injustice to the Governor. He represented the message as an alternative recommendation of a ten million State bank. If, said Mr. W., I have read the message correctly, so far from its recommending the incorporation of such an institution, it expressly repudiates it, and very properly and emphatically cautions the legislature, while they are resisting the continuance of an uncontrollable and assuming moneyed power in the Federal Government, not to create one in the State which may follow the example of the Federal creation, and set itself up against the Government which gives it life and being. The express purpose of the message was to express the disapprobation of the Governor towards such an incorporation, and if the legislature shall think the crisis demands it and the real wants of the citizens require legislative aid, that the broad credit of the State shall be extended for their relief, rather than that such a bank shall be created by the State authority. I am convinced, therefore, that when the Senator shall look at the message more carefully, he will do the Governor justice in this particular, and will not seek to charge upon him, either as an alternative measure or otherwise, the recommendation of such a bank.

The honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] upon a late occasion, when speaking of this message, fell into a more palpable error. This, too, must have arisen from his having looked too hastily at the document, for Mr. W. said he was sure the honorable gentleman would not designedly have ascribed to the Governor, objects which his message, upon its face, expressly disclaimed. The Senator had said the Governor of New York had proposed this loan to sustain the State banks. Such, said Mr. W., is not the purpose of the message, and, so far from it, the language of the paper denies both that object and its necessity. He must, he said, trouble the Senate with the reading of a short paragraph from the message to sustain himself in this assertion. Governor Marcy, in the communication referred to, speaks of the information which had been officially communicated to him as to the condition of the State banks on the 4th instant, and then uses the following language as to those banks:

"So far, therefore, as the banks themselves are concerned, I entertain not the slightest doubt, either of their present or future ability to meet any crisis that can occur; but under a state of things which may be imagined, a proper regard for their own safety may put it out of their power to afford those accommodations to the public which its interests may require."

Will the honorable Senator, after looking at this language, say that the measure proposed is to sustain the banks. No, sir, he cannot say so. Such a conclusion is directly contradicted by the declaration that the banks are prepared "to meet any crisis that can occur." They, therefore, do not want to be sustained, but the community to want aid, and to furnish such aid is the object of the message.

The honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] further complains that those who support this message refer to periods of war and public calamity for precedents to support it, and seems disposed to express surprise that the State of New York should consider this a period justifying such a measure on the part of her Government. Still the honorable gentleman exults over the message as a conclusive confession of the existence of that distress which he has so strongly and so frequently pictured to us during our present occasion. Has the Senator looked well to both sides of his argument upon this message? Has he borne in his mind the confidence with which he has repeated and repeated to us that the country is now suffering under a pecuniary pressure, such as was never before known to it? Is he unwilling that we should believe him in these assurances? Or is he unwilling that the Governor of New York should take his positions for truth? He will not tell us this; and if he does not, then the crisis calls for measures equal to it. If the Senator concedes to me this ground, I can tell him that measures of the character proposed in the late message of Governor Marcy are not new to my State. In 1786 the country was borne down with the pressure of the debt of the Revolution; its credit was greatly depreciated, its currency much deranged, and the burdens imposed upon the citizens were necessarily heavy, and their means small. At that period New York extended itself for the relief of its tax-paying population, and made a loan of a large amount, which it distributed to the counties for the relief of the community. In 1792, finding that the same pressure was not yet relieved, it repeated the act, and a second loan was made to relieve its citizens. The restrictive measures of 1808 brought another period of pressure, and New York, instead of throwing herself against the country and leaving her patriotic sons to become disaffected by suffering, and to alienate their feelings from our institutions, or suffer their patriotism to become cool, again extended her credit over them, and, by a third loan, gave them courage and confidence to meet the crisis. But, Mr. President, another period still more signally tried the wisdom and firmness of the Government of that State. In the year 1814, at the darkest hour of the late war, the tremendous power of direct taxation vested in the Federal Government by the constitution, came down upon the citizens of New York in its practical force. They were embarrassed and oppressed; they had extended their whole energies to support the war; their commerce was destroyed; their trade suspended; and their internal burdens had been increased to meet the increased demands upon their own treasury. In this condition they were ill able to meet the exactions of additional taxes, and the State stepped forth for their relief; interposed its means and its credit; assumed and paid the tax to the Government; and gave to the citizens time to meet the demand without sacrifice and without distress.

Sir, New York considers this another crisis in our affairs, similar in its character to those I have mentioned. The war is not with a foreign enemy, but it is with a moneyed power created by our own Government, and existing within our own borders. The exertion of that power, like that of the foreign enemy during the late war, has been recently pointed at New York; at her institutions; at her trade; and at her prosperity. Do gentlemen wish her to fold her arms and see her citizens cut down and sacrificed, when the means of relief are in her hands? She has never done that, and she will not now do it. The message of her Governor, so much complained of, is a confession of the distress of which the memorialists before you complain; but, let me tell the respectable committee who hear me, it is not an empty confession of distress. It is one of those cheering confessions which carries with it the remedy they say they so much need; the remedy for the distress the existence of which it concedes. Will they resist it, and still tell us of their pecuniary troubles?

Mr. President, said Mr. W., the honorable Senator, in the course of his remarks, made one recommendation which I heard from him with regret. He recommended to my constituents the manufacture of caps with bells. I, sir, have never found it necessary to recommend such a branch of business, but, if it be considered important, I cannot object to its commencement in my own State, for I know well that its free citizens will designate the wearers. I also know, that when any man, however high his standing, shall undertake to make them believe that the continuance of their liberties and the existence of our free institutions are dependent upon a bank; that this happy confederacy must fall to pieces and be separated, unless bound together by a bank, their imaginations may seem to hear the bells rattle; that when any man shall tell them that their power to resist a foreign enemy terminates with a geographical line bounding their own territory, they may think they see a head for the cap.

Mr. EWING next rose, and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President: If any apology be necessary for troubling the Senate with a few observations on the presentation of this memorial, I find it as well in the intimate relation which exists between the city from which it comes and my own State, as in the request of the delegation, that I should render my aid in placing their views, and the views of those who sent them, fairly before the Senate.

Sir, the city of Albany stands at the outlet of one of the three great channels of inland navigation, which bears the rich products of the West, and commits them to the tides of the ocean. The first and greatest of these outlets is that which nature has given us, the Mississippi and its tributaries: the city of New Orleans is the mart to which this brings us—the emporium of our Southern commerce. That part of the State of Ohio which borders on the river and its navigable branches, and all the extensive and fertile valley of the Miamias, send their products there. How that city has been affected by the experiment, the Senators from that State have already told you. One thing, perhaps, it is due that I should say concerning it; it is that, in their enumeration of the losses of the West by this blow upon credit and commerce, they underrate greatly the quantity of our staples, flour and pork, on which the depression of prices must operate. The amount exported from the city of Cincinnati alone, does, I have no doubt, equal, if not exceed, what is assigned by them to the whole upper country. It is that city, and that portion of the State, that must share in the commercial misfortunes of New Orleans; and the embarrassments arising from the shock on credit in that city, must be carried there with a strong and quick vibration.

Another outlet for our Western produce—not extensively used, but by no means unimportant—is through Lake Erie and the Welland canal, to Montreal, in Canada. How this market is affected by the present state of things here, I know not—sensibly, I have no doubt; for, though it is in another kingdom, it is closely connected in commerce with the city of New York. Branches of the same houses are established at both cities, and a pressure in the one must, in a greater or less degree, affect the other. Besides, sir, the capital of Montreal is limited, far too limited to receive the whole commerce of the West; and, if higher prices are hoped for them, the market will be suddenly glutted, and from this circumstance alone their prices will fall to nothing.

But our important outlet, especially to the whole central and northern portion of Ohio, is that which, passing through the Ohio canal, Lake Erie, and the Grand canal of New York, terminates at Albany, and there commits to the tides of the ocean, the rich products of the fields and the forests of the West. Hence, sir, the close connexion which I feel to exist between the prosperity of that city and her great neighboring emporium, and my own State. Their prosperity is our prosperity, and their adversity also is ours; and hence I may be allowed to feel a deep interest in the prosperity, and also in the opinions of that city.

There are two memorials before the Senate, each professing to represent those opinions. The one presented by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts is signed by more than 2,900 free and independent electors of the city of Albany. That they are citizens truly and in good faith, I have no doubt, from the standing and intelligence and high character of the gentlemen who bear it here, and vouch for its truth. It contains, according to their judgment and belief, nearly three-fourths of all the qualified voters in the city. The one just presented by the honorable Senator from New York purports to contain the names of 1,700 individuals, a large portion of whom, 16-17ths at least, the honorable Senator says he is assured are real names, and citizens and voters. As there are, however, on the two memorials, as the Senator from New York assures us, 700 names more than there are voters in the city, there must have been, of course, extensive mistakes or imposition somewhere. The committee who bear the first do not believe that there is any error; that which they have presented—every care was taken to avoid the possibility of error, and to be assured that no names but the names of citizens and voters should be attached to the paper; and they think they have been entirely successful. As to the counter memorial, the honorable Senator admits that the gentleman who handed it to him advised him that the names were not all names of citizens and voters, but a very large proportion of them are so.

Mr. WRIGHT explained: He had been misunderstood by the Senator from Ohio; the memorial was not handed to him, but forwarded to him by mail, and the gentleman who sent it—a gentleman of the highest respectability—assured him that the utmost pains had been taken to exclude all names except those of citizens and voters, but that he would not undertake to say that they had been entirely successful; but he did say that a large proportion of them, at least 16-17ths, were legal votes.

Mr. EWING resumed: I had accidentally mistaken a word dropped by the honorable Senator, and it was merely the difference between handing and sending, which does not strike me as material to the substance of the matter; however, it is now set right. This paper, then, is not exactly what it purports to be, though it would seem that it comes very near it. It is admitted to be a little tinged with error, or whatever else we may call its aberrations. Such being the admitted fact, we may perhaps be less at a loss than we would otherwise have been, to account for the 700 spurious names which are certainly presented to us on one or the other, or on the two memorials. In confirmation of the opinion of the honorable Senator and his correspondent, that they have not been entirely successful in their attempt to detect fictitious or surreptitious names, I would add the convictions of the committee who are the bearers of the first memorial. They say that some of those whose names appear there were dead some time before the subject was agitated. Several of these were named to me; two I noted, who were personally well known to gentlemen here: Francis Lowe, who died of the cholera last year, is one; he left a son, Frank, who is a lad in his teens, and may perhaps be the signer. Another, Freeman Crosby, who died in January last, and left no person behind him in the city bearing his name. How many more are in the like predicament I know not, and it would be tedious to require. It is said, however, and I risk this confidently on the same authority, that there is not more than 200 names on that memorial known to any, the oldest inhabitant of Albany; and of those, nearly one-half are office-holders under the State or General Government. Thus it is that public opinion is arrayed in that city on this subject. And it should not be forgotten, that there is the seat of the central power—the very throne of the Regency is there, hic illius arma—hic currus—and that, until the effect of the experiment began to be felt, the sway of that regency was absolute and its power triumphant.

The city of Albany, Mr. President, owing to its peculiar situation—it being a commercial city, chiefly dependent, not upon the ocean commerce and the ships that sail to and from its port, but an inland trade, which comes from all the counties to the West, from New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Michigan, and the borders of the great lakes, even to Lake Superior. Supplied by the Grand canal, a channel of communication which is ice-bound from November until the close of the present month, they of course, so far as their commerce was concerned, could not directly and immediately feel the malign influence of this Executive measure. But the season has come, in which our Northern lakes and our streams are set free from the icy fetters in which winter had bound them. It is now the wonted season of business, of bustle, of activity, and enterprise. But the lake may toss its waves, or spread its smooth and glassy bottom, as if to invite the deck, but in vain; the bland southwest may pass over and brush its surface, and sigh for the sail that it has so often filled, but in vain. The canal is a solitude, the lake a desert waste of waters, and the busy hum of the city returns not with the all-livening season; for the hand which has been laid upon the vital energies of a nation, is as benumbing, as congealing, as the touch of winter to the motion of the fluids, and it is more enduring and more relentless. Hence it is, that the life and energy which the returning spring gives to all creation else, is withheld from the commerce of our country; and this city, which has lived and flourished upon credit and commerce, instead of awakening to new life and vigor in their wonted season, views its return, not with joy and hope, but with apprehension and dismay. The day at which old contracts are to be met, and new engagements are to be made, is at hand—but the means of payment for the past are wanting; for the wares remain in the hands of the merchant, he cannot sell to meet his purchase. Those who have traded on their own capital suffer loss—those who trade on borrowed capital, ruin. The money which was heretofore supplied upon the canal line, upon the lake shore, and on the Ohio canal, to purchase the produce of the country, has disappeared. The farmer can find no market for his produce, and it remains to waste, and feed the vermin in his barn and stackyard, instead of yielding profit to him, and extending plenty and comfort to the laborer and artisan of our manufacturing and commercial cities.

Sir, when I had the honor to address you early in January last, at a time when gentlemen said there was no pressure, no distress, I stated most expressly my belief, that the West had then suffered but little, except in her principal commercial cities; but that the opening of spring, which with them, as with the people of New York, and Albany, and Utica, and Buffalo, is the commercial season, would bring misfortune and ruin to hundreds of the honest and enterprising citizens of Ohio; and that it would be a season of general pressure and calamity to men of all classes, and professions, and business, there. What I said, events have verified. I claim, sir, no merit for sagacity, foreseeing these things; they come upon the principles of absolute necessity; and it is like predicting that a storm, which is left in mid-air without support, will fall to the earth, or that the mountain torrent will pour its waters to the valley. It requires no six years' study of the principles of attraction and repulsion, to discover all this; a little experience and observation is quite sufficient.

The memorialists deny that, in their opinion, any considerable portion of the present sufferings of the country is arisen from over-trading. In this I entirely concur with them. I do not think it has, especially in that section of the country in which I am most intimately acquainted. How can it be so, when our merchants conduct few or no debts abroad?—when the produce which is sent off, supplies the fund out of which payment is made for the imported merchandise, and a handsome profit left to the trader? If, for example, before this disturbed state of credit came upon us, a trader should have sold his bill of exchange on New York for $4,000, and purchased with the proceeds 1,000 barrels of flour, he shipped the flour, had it laid down in market, and sold in time to pay his bill, leaving him a profit with which he is satisfied, after paying for time, freight, and insurance. Suppose this trader is not worth a dollar, except his credit and capacity for business, has he over-traded? No man will say he has. He has but engaged in that enterprise which gives wealth to individuals, and advances the prosperity of a country; and yet, under the pressure of this "experiment," such a man, engaged in such an enterprise, is overwhelmed with sudden and irretrievable ruin. And it is he—the man in whom his neighbors place confidence, and to whom they will give their credit; the man who is struggling by his own industry, and enterprise, and energies, to better his condition, and provide for those who depend upon him for support—who, under the pressure of this "experiment," must break, and who, it is said, ought to break.

Sir, I am led here to consider this experiment in an aspect, obvious indeed, but which has been much dwelt upon in the course of this protracted discussion. It is this. Who is to suffer, and who to profit by this experiment? The honorable Senator from New York [Mr. Wright] has said, that of the signers of the two memorials—all are members of the same community—all are exposed alike to the same evils—and if they suffer, all must suffer equally. Is it so, sir? Who are the principal signers to the memorial which the honorable Senator presents? A host, a whole regiment of office-holders, with their fixed salaries. Let us inquire who is to suffer and who is to profit by the experiment? How is the good and evil, if there be any good arising from it, to be distributed? I have already given you an illustration of the sudden ruin it may and must bring down, not only upon one individual, but a whole class of young traders, just entered upon business, and dealing on borrowed capital; the case is not far different with those who have pursued a successful business to the period of middle life. The business of our country requires all its capital and all its credit to sustain its commerce and expand its growing energies—the merchant who has accumulated wealth, nevertheless employs it all in a variety of adventures, and he reasonably believes that, by venturing all his capital and all his credit upon many bottoms, no sudden fluctuation, which sinks one commodity in the market and leaves a profit on the rest, can essentially injure him: hence, so long as he is in trade, he yields his all to his occupation.

But this experiment strikes all down, with one common desolation—a desolation against which no foresight could guard—which no prudence or energy could resist. The unhappy man is left to mourn over his fallen fortunes and blighted hopes; to view with hollow eye and wrinkled brow an age of poverty—to see his character blasted in the eyes of the world: for to the merchant ruin is also dishonor—but he may be told for his consolation, that the result will be glory to the President, success to the regency, and fortunes to the office-holders and those who riot in the spoils of victory.

The farmer depends upon the yearly surplus of his farm to supply his family with those innocent luxuries, which habit has rendered necessary even to the most frugal. The most prudent contract small debts during the year, which their produce, when sold, is to pay for, and furnish a fund for further expenses. But the experiment has deprived the merchant of the means of purchase, and, what is worse, cut off the market in the cities for the staples of the country. The merchant, to save himself, must press the collection of his small debts. Those who have capital will not lend it without enormous interest. Perhaps the farmer may have purchased a small addition to his plantation, or rented lands at a cash rent, with the confident hope that the products would pay his debts and yield him a profit. In that event, the experiment falls upon him with destructive energy; his farm and his property are sacrificed, and he is turned out penniless upon the world. But still new wreaths of glory are won, and the experiment goes bravely forward.

The mechanic, in the stagnation of all business, finds his occupation gone, and his means of subsistence gone with it. This valuable class of men, though they rear their families in comfort, and decency, and usefulness, are, as a class, seldom rich. They lay up in early life a comfortable provision for old age; they educate their sons and daughters in a manner that will qualify them, with natural advantages and their active habits, to enter, as they may choose, into any of the walks of life; but the mechanic does not expect, nor can they prepare themselves at once, in the career of usefulness and capacity for exertion, to see their pursuits destroyed, their hopes blighted, and their powers and capacities for usefulness left to waste themselves in inaction. But so it is, and such the experiment.

And last, but not least, among those who are to bear and suffer, is the laborer. He whose only wealth, the sole fund which sustains himself, and supports those that are dependent on him, is the strength of his arm, the vigor of his limbs, the steadiness of his habits, and the constant encouragement and reward which his industry finds in the business of the country. But the experiment has struck that business down, and the employment of the laborer; and the comforts of his humble home, are gone with it. The partner of his fortunes, pale with sorrow and watching and want; his children supplicating for the bread which he has not, and cannot give them. And where are the boundless products of our land which have hitherto found their way to our cities, and filled them with such rich abundance? Fixed to the spot where they were first stored by the farmer, there to remain, to fatten the vermin that infest his barn-yard. He cannot remove it, whom it encumbers rather than enriches; they cannot procure it, who are famishing for want.

But the office-holders, the signers and procurers of the honorable Senator's memorial, are united, almost to a man, in favor of the experiment. Need I name them? Are they not written in the Blue Book, their names and avocations, to the number of forty thousand? A mercenary band, who fight for place and pay. And these men it is, who ask their fellow-citizens to endure every thing—to see their fortunes wrecked, and their wives and children want the comforts, and even the necessities of life—that they, the office-holders, may keep their offices and their salaries, and that their chief may gather fresh wreaths of glory. In the great city of New York, where all other classes, except the great money capitalists, are suffering the deepest distress, how do they fare, and what do they suffer? A marker, with his salary of $4,331; a gauger, with his $2,558; a measurer, with his $2,762; a naval officer, with his $3,000, and so on, through many closely-printed pages of the book. Now, as the price of every thing on which men subsist falls, and as labor falls, the salaries of these patriots rise in value. When the depression approaches the extreme point to which it inevitably tends, they will be worth double what they now are worth. And when the unfortunate man, belonging to any of the industrious classes, is ruined, by the derangement of the times, his property passes, by an easy gradation from under the hammer of the auctioneer, into the hands of these worthies. This it is to enjoy, to the full extent, the spoils of victory. If their funds should fall short of what is necessary to take all the good bargains that offer, do not the deposit banks owe it to their situation, and to the allegiance due to the agent of the Treasury, that they lend to these very safe and patriotic gentlemen, enough of the public funds to gratify their very moderate wishes? And if labor be desired—if they want hewers of wood and drawers of water, and servants for their household, the sons and daughters of the laborer, whom the experiment has driven out of employment, must serve them for the bare pittance of food on which they may subsist, and the clothes to cover them.

These gentlemen ask the people to suffer ruin, and privation, and misery, that they may appropriate their goods to themselves, and be their task-masters and rulers. This is the manner, sir, in which the gentlemen who got up the honorable Senator's [Mr. WILSON'S] memorial share in the sufferings of the community.

I would here correct an error into which the gentleman has fallen, as to the remarks of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, not now in his place. He seems to suppose that the honorable Senator had predicted the transportation on the canal, for the present year, would not amount to one-tenth of the past. And he seems also to insinuate that this prediction was based on the authority of the committee who are the bearers of this memorial, and that they will, by sending this abroad, proclaim the ruin of that commerce, which they thus foretell. Nothing, Mr. President, can be more unjust, than as to the remarks of the absent Senator, and the gentlemen of the committee.

The Senator from Massachusetts did say, on the authority of those gentlemen, that the amount of country produce now upon the banks of the canal, and waiting for its opening, is not equal to one-tenth of that which was upon it in the corresponding season of the past year; and this, I understand the Senator from New York admits to be the fact. The Senator from Massachusetts did then predict that the commerce on the canal would be greatly lessened within the current year from what it had been in the past, unless the experiment were abandoned. The fact, then, is as it was stated. The prediction is drawn from that fact, and many others, detailed by the Senator from Massachusetts, as the falling off of the lumber business—the stop put to all improvement—the scarcity of money, and the loss of employment, and consequent inability among the poorer classes to purchase the ordinary comforts of life.

But the Senator from New York says, that the commerce will still remain the same—all the articles of ordinary export which have not yet gone out of the country still remain in it, and must necessarily seek a market—that all which has not gone out will yet go out, and that business on the canal will be as brisk as ever, and the tolls as great as ever, in the month of May next. I do not for myself think this will be the case—but time will show. The merchant will not buy and ship the same amount of produce, when he cannot sell it at a good price, as he will when it well rewards his enterprise. Ordinarily, trade is brisk or dull in proportion to the price commanded by commodities, and the readiness of sale; and it is in vain to say that the produce is in the country, and must go out whether it bring a price or not. If, like water, it flowed to the ocean without human agency, it might be so; but there must be something to induce men to employ their capital and labor in its purchase and transportation, or it must remain where it is, until wasted or consumed.

But the Senator from New York intimates that the state of the money market and of the mercantile community ought not to have been disclosed by the committee, lest that knowledge should injure or destroy the commerce of their city. I cannot well conceive, sir, how those gentlemen can be amenable to this censure. The facts which they state, and which have been stated on this floor by their authority, are indubitably true. They relate to the general commerce, to the markets of the city. And ought the actual state of things to be disguised or con-ealed? For what purpose? Surely not to draw the unvarying thither, with their merchandise, under the delusion of false hopes; to the end that their cargoes might be sacrificed, and the trader ruined. What sensible purpose, then, would be answered by concealing the actual state of things? None in the world. It might, perhaps, perpetuate, but it could not lighten the evil. The same complaint which the honorable Senator presses with so much seriousness against this committee, would apply equally well to him who should publish a price current in times of depression of prices. Still it is universally admitted, that it is wise as well as just; for, in the mercantile community, more emphatically than any other, honesty and candor are the true policy.

True, sir, if any remedy be devised for their present commercial embarrassments—if confidence and credit be restored, and the products of the country can again command their usual prices, the transportation upon the canal will be as great, or even greater, the present year, than heretofore—for the products of the country are more abundant, and the trade of the West is constantly tending to pour itself into that channel. The relief which is proposed by Governor Marcy is a palliative merely, not a remedy.

The whole body politic, in its commercial and financial relations, is paralyzed. It is as if, in the human frame, an iron pressure on the sensorium threw the whole body and limbs into convulsive agony; and the presumption is as vain as would be that of the physician who should apply fomentations or narcotic lotions to the convulsed limbs, without first removing the benumbing cause from the seat of life. So it is with the State; and whatever palliatives may be applied, there or elsewhere, until the hand of lawless power which presses on the credit of the nation be lifted, or shall relax its grasp, there can be no substantial remedy. If the object of Governor Marcy be to relieve the community, as I have no doubt, in part, it is, I think it unfortunate that he has not recommended the mode, and the only mode, which could render that relief effectual, by putting an end to the war which is waged against the Bank of the United States; restore quiet and harmony to our moneyed institutions; and life and activity to the business of the country. His recommendation might have done much, here and elsewhere.

There are, sir, some portions of that message which I look upon as in the highest degree exceptionable. The message is not, it is true, before the Senate, for any purpose of legislative action, but it is one of the indicia of public opinion with which we are favored, and the Governor himself is, as I understand, a signer to the memorial offered by the honorable Senator from New York. The Senator nods assent—then I was not mistaken. In one clause of that message, his excellency permits himself to characterize the debates in Congress as the mere indications of what the Bank of the United States intends to do—directly conveying the idea, that the Congress, or a portion of the Congress of the United States, is moved by the bank, and acts according to its mandates. The passage I refer to is in these words:

“From recent debates in the national legislature—from the tone of the presses which advocate the cause of the bank—from the language of public meetings—from the organization of party—and from other indications too plain to be mistaken, the efforts of the bank seem to be directed especially against the moneyed institutions of the State of New York.” The debates in Congress, therefore, are among the indications of the course of the bank. Of this I think we have a right to complain. Yet it is following out the custom of the day: the Executive of the United States directs the whole force of his influence to humble, and, if possible, to crush the legislative branches of the Government. The pensioned presses join in and swell the general cry; and the Governor of the empire State now lends his force, mighty as it may be, to aid in prostrating and bringing into odium the legislative power of the nation. Since his excellency has thought proper to indulge in remarks of this character and tendency, he need not be surprised if some attention be paid here to the message which contains them. He begins by conveying, not in direct terms, but yet too plain to be mistaken, an idea which somewhat surprised me, and, to avoid a misreading, I read his own words from the paper that is before me. In the second paragraph he says, “It was not then perceived that the order of the Treasury Department, directing the accruing receipts of the public moneys to be deposited in the local banks instead of the Bank of the United States, could essentially interrupt the business transactions of the community, nor is it now supposed that any necessary connexion exists between that act and the present state of commercial embarrassment.” And again, a little further on, he adds—“Although the removal of the deposits, effected as it was prospectively, and operating on the funds in hand, not by withdrawing the whole suddenly, but gradually as the wants of the Government required, furnished of itself no sufficient cause for the results, which in point of time have followed it; yet it is said that its operation has been to derange the currency, to destroy confidence, and thus to produce the present embarrassment.”

Here, sir, in the first clause, is a distinct assumption—in the second an affirmation—the one conveying the idea that the Secretary of the Treasury had merely directed that the deposits should cease to be made in the Bank of the United States; the other, that the public moneys were gradually withdrawn from that bank, no faster than the wants of the Government required. Now, I ask you, sir, and I ask all who hear me, is this true? Does not every intelligent man in the community know that it is not so? And I cannot but regret that the Senators from New York did not furnish to their Executive at least the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on that subject, if all other means of information were closed to him, that they might have saved him from falling into such an egregious error; for I cannot for a moment suppose that it was the intention of the Chief Magistrate of that great and enlightened community to convey, through his official message, a false impression to the legislature or the people.

I think the honorable Senator from Kentucky is right, and my friend from Kentucky mistaken, as to the bearing and purpose of part of the message. It mentions a proposition for a large bank, with a capital of eight or ten millions, to be made up partly of State stock, and partly of individual subscriptions; but he mentions only to condemn it, and to add yet another word condemnatory of the Bank of the United States. His real proposition is to create a State stock, of four millions of dollars, to lend it out, part of it on interest, to the State banks, by way of sustaining them, and part of it to individuals, through the means of agents, to be appointed and stationed for that purpose, in the several counties. He expresses his fears, that, if a bank be chartered, and the funds placed in its power, it will refuse to yield obedience to those who create it. But there is no fear of a want of allegiance in the State banks, so long as the proposed fund of four millions, in addition to the canal fund, which is now about $2,500,000, is held up to be sued for.

While on this part of the subject, let me advert to some remarks made by the Senator from New York several days ago, and which I could not then get the floor to answer. In reply to the Senator from Massachusetts, who suggested that the safety-fund banks were governed by the dominant party in New York, and that the commissioners by whom they were inspected were regency-men, the Senator from New York replied, that two out of three of those commissioners were elected by the banks, and that three-fourths of the bank stock was owned by the political friends of the Senator from Massachusetts. It struck me, at the time, that it was a departure in pleading, and that the affirmations of both the Senators were according to the fact. And so I believe it is. The minority—and it is, in truth, a very small minority—of the stock governs those banks in all their elections. How this is, the honorable Senator from New York can tell better than I; for he better knows the process by which minorities are made to rule majorities. I will, however, attempt to point out some of the means by which I suppose it to be brought about.

Capitalists, and business men who own bank stock, do not trouble themselves about the politics of their directory—nor indeed do they meddle with it at all, except to secure its profitable management. But the organized troops of politicians whom the regency has always at command, distributed through all portions of the State, (and sometimes invading the territories of their neighbors,) are always on the alert, in great matters and small. And there has been withal a very handsome sum in annual deposits arising from the canal fund, in which all were anxious to partake, and in which none could hope to partake, unless they elected officers acceptable to the ruling powers at Albany. Thus, those who were easy about politics, and anxious for large dividends, suffered the control over their banks to fall into the hands of men who know and improve their value as political engines. This sum of four millions of dollars, increased by the canal fund to nearly seven millions, will enhance to a great extent the political power of those institutions, and at the same time it must ensure their political servility. But this is not all—loan offices are to be established in all the counties in the State and agents are to be appointed, I venture to say good liege men, to loan out a portion of this four millions among the people. Or, rather, this large sum must be raised from the people, and loaned out to political favorites, or to such as can be purchased by a douceur. It seems to me, sir, that the power here accumulated in the hands of one set of men within that State, is tremendous. There is, in the first place, the power and patronage of the General Government, most liberally applied; the money of the people of the United States to the amount of many millions annually; the State officers; the State banks leagued together by a political chain, artfully framed; the work of magic, which never can break; the salt duties and canal tolls, making a prodigious annual sum; and, last of all, this further sum of four millions of dollars raised from the people, and so applied as to ensure their political thralldom.

Governor Marcy, however, turns with horror from "the disgusting spectacle" of the Bank of the United States, "arrayed in political opposition against the Government;" but there is no disgust excited in his mind by witnessing the combined powers which I have just enumerated, arrayed against the people, and controlling the elective franchise. His spirits are calm and his nerves are firm, while he looks on this. But it seems, from the connexion in which he has placed the bank and the national legislature, that the latter, and perhaps this body in particular, may share some portion of his antipathy and disapprobation. I could hope, that no unpleasant reminiscences, no associations of a painful nature, linger in the mind of his excellency, and bias his feelings; still it is possible, for we know the influence they have, and will ever have, on the opinions even of the wisest. I recollect, some years ago, there was pending before the Ohio legislature, a law to punish certain offences at the post, familiarly called the whipping law; it was a subject of warm discussion, both in and out of the house. In an earnest controversy one evening, a gentleman observed, that he would never consent to the passage of the bill; and added as a reason, that he had been whipped so much himself when he was a boy, that he had become perfectly disgusted with the whole process. Whatever may have taken place here, to excite unpleasant recollections in the mind of Governor Marcy, whatever severe hits he may have received which he now thinks of with disgust, there are still some things with which I am sure he never will be disgusted, come thick and abundant as they may—I mean "the spoils of victory."

[Mr. CLAY having also answered Mr. WHEAT, at some length, Mr. WHEAT replied as follows:]

Mr. President, I beg the Senate to be assured that I do not intend to protract this discussion. My reply to the honorable gentlemen shall be very brief; and first to the honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY.] I thank him for his remarks, and I am happy that so many of the citizens of New York have been present to hear him. I particularly call the attention of the members of the committee from Albany to the tendency of his argument. It is to show to them, that if they destroy the Bank of the United States, they are to have too much money; that then New York is to have the use of full the one-half of all the public deposits, whereas, if that bank be re-chartered, they are to have the use of but one-sixth. It is not my duty to answer such an argument here, and I cheerfully leave it to the respectable business members of that committee to say if such is the evil against which it is their purpose to guard themselves and those whom they represent.

Again, the honorable Senator's alarm as to the safe management of the New York banks, arises from the fact that the legislature has reserved the right to repeal their charters; in other words, the power over them is reserved to the people themselves, acting through their immediate representatives: representatives as "honest, capable, and faithful" as any who represent a free people. Sir, said Mr. W., the people of New York do not complain of their banks for this cause; they do not distrust them for this cause, nor will any portion of the citizens of that State, not even the committee who lay this memorial before us, make this a ground of complaint. But the Chancellor of the State, the highest judicial officer of the Government, has a duty to perform in the execution of the laws regulating the New York banks, and the honorable Senator seems to suppose that he, too, is to bend in subservency to an undefined political purpose. Sir, said Mr. W., I am compelled to admit, that if the Governor, the legislature, the chancellor, and the people of New York, are to be held as corrupt and profligate, there may be no safety in the banks of that State; but, until that is shown, I must be permitted to think that the confidence of no citizen of that State will be shaken, or his pride flattered, by the assumption of such grounds for apprehension.

A single remark for the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. EWING.] If, sir, said Mr. W., that honorable gentleman understands as little about the affairs of his own State as his remarks to-day have shown he does about those of New York, it will not be surprising to me, and must not be to him, should Ohio send instructions here which he cannot obey. Sir, in relation to New York, he talks about institutions he does not understand, and honest, vigilant, and faithful public officers he does not know.

A single other remark, Mr. President, to the honorable Senator, and I have done. I never have, and, while I myself hold a public office and cling to it for my living, I hope I never shall consider it my duty to declaim against public office-holders, or to declare it an impeachment, in my judgment, against an honorable and high-minded man, that he holds an office.

The memorial (presented by Mr. WHESTER) was then referred to the Committee on Finance.

ive in removing the deposits, was then read, and, after a few observations between Mr. CLAY and Mr. WRIGHT, ordered to be referred to the Committee on Finance, and to be printed.

Mr. EWING gave notice that he should to-morrow call for consideration the bill making appropriations for extending the Cumberland road through the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois; and as the Senate was not full, and the hour was late, he moved an adjournment, but withdrew the motion at the instance of

Mr. POINDEXTER, upon whose motion the Senate proceeded to the orders of the day, and took up several bills from the House of Representatives, which were ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Upon the bill for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of Moses Shepherd, deceased, being called up, upon its passage—

Mr. SPRAGUE rose and said, that considerable litigation had previously occurred upon the merits of that claim, and as the Senate was thin, and the usual hour for adjournment had long since passed, he should not urge any member to explain its provisions, but would move that the Senate adjourn.

The Senate then adjourned.

TUESDAY, APRIL 1.

RHODE ISLAND ELECTION.

Mr. WRIGHT said, that, as a minority of the select committee to whom was referred the case of the contested seat in the Senate of one of the Senators from Rhode Island, he wished to present a counter report, which he would ask to have printed.

Mr. POINDEXTER said it was not his understanding of parliamentary usage, that a minority of a committee had a right to make a counter report, for the purpose of combating the arguments of a majority of the committee. He understood that, when this report was made by the committee, some conversation was had with regard to the expression of its opinion on the subject by a minority of that body, and it seemed to be the general understanding that something like an opinion should be received. He had no objection to receiving from the minority a mere substantive proposition, but he did not understand it to be in accordance with parliamentary rule, that a single individual should make a report of what was simply his own opinions. The paper now submitted by the gentleman from New York was not, if he understood it, in the form of a report; indeed, a report from a minority of a committee appeared to him as a solecism. A minority of Congress might as well attempt to legislate. If the paper was an argumentative response to the report of the committee, the honorable member could make a better one in his seat; and he, for one, would object to receiving it. The precedent referred to by the Senator from Alabama, was one in which the Senate, after some discussion, refused to receive the paper as a report from the minority, but agreed to receive it as a paper simply expressing the views of two of the committee, in opposition to the views of the majority, consisting of three members. Under these circumstances, he should be under the necessity of calling for the reading of the paper before he consented to receive it.

Mr. WRIGHT said he would answer the objections of the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. POINDEXTER.] The paper he wished to present contained his own substantive views on the subject, and was also an argumentative response to the report of the committee. He certainly would not permit the Senator to be deceived with regard to the character of the paper, and, having thus frankly explained its contents, he should, without any feeling whatever, abide by the decision of the Senate. Without knowing what had been the settled practice in the Senate in relation to such counter reports, he had taken for his guide the practice of the other House; and, at the time the committee reported, he stated very candidly what were his wishes, but that he felt some reluctance to undergo the trouble of drawing up a report unless it would be agreeable to the Senate to receive it. The Senator from Alabama then offered, if he would consent, in making his report, to act in accordance with the understanding of the several Senators who had given their views on the subject, to withdraw his motion to lay the report on the table. With the understanding, then, that no opposition would be made to receiving the counter report, he had felt it his duty to present it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN was sorry to hear the Senator from New York admit that the paper he wished to present was a response to the report of the committee. He should have been very glad to have accorded to him an opportunity of presenting his views on the subject, but could not consent to receive the paper in the shape the gentleman saw fit to present it. He certainly never had any idea that a minority had a right to take up a report of a committee, and exercise their ingenuity in tearing it to pieces. This would be putting the majority in the background, unless they were allowed the opportunity of again replying; and how far was this to extend? He did hope the honorable Senator would put his paper in such a shape as would allow of its being received without the objection he had adverted to.

Mr. SPRAGUE said, that, at the time the report of the committee was made, he stated to the Senate his wishes that the gentleman from New York might have an opportunity of presenting his views on the subject, on the ground, as stated by the gentleman himself, that that paper had been for some time in the possession of the chairman of the committee, so that he had had no opportunity of preparing a statement of his own opinions. On the ground, then, that the Senator from New York had not been prepared, by the possession of this paper, to make a substantive statement, he certainly was willing to extend to him every indulgence to enable him to do so. He certainly thought, however, that the views of the gentleman when presented, would have been of the same character as if they had been presented at that time. He certainly would have considered it very irregular to give the gentleman the report of the committee for the purpose of enabling him to draw up an argumentative response to it. The general opinions of the Senate were founded, at the time, on the authority of the precedent quoted by the Senator from Alabama. It was, that the gentlemen composing the minority of the committee were permitted, on that occasion, to hand in a paper, not as an argument against the report, but as simply containing the opinions of a minority of the committee. This precedent being found on the Journals, he (Mr. S.) would not, in a new instance, refuse a like privilege to a minority of another committee; that he would be willing prospectively to settle the rule, that such papers should not, in future, be received. This precedent, however, so far as he understood it, did not sanction the receipt of an argumentative counter report, and he would, therefore, be opposed to the receiving the paper presented by the gentleman from New York, if it was drawn up in that shape.

Mr. EWING moved to lay the subject on the table, for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the Cumberland road bill; which was agreed to.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

On motion of Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, the Senate took up for consideration the bill making an appropriation of $300,000 for the repair of the Cumberland road.

Mr. HENDRICKS moved to amend the bill by introducing the following words: "and erecting the necessary toll-houses and toll-gates."

SENATE.]

Cumberland Road.

[April 1, 1854.]

Mr. POINDEXTER objected to the amendment as unnecessary. He was of opinion that, agreeably to former policy, small appropriations for the erection of toll-houses should be made when the road should be transferred to the States.

Mr. HENDRICKS had no desire to raise difficulties, and would assent to the suggestion of the Senator from Mississippi, if necessary.

Mr. WILKINS said the two great objects of Congress were to repair the road, and to get it off the hands of the General Government. The States had said they would take the road after it was repaired and toll-houses had been erected; and the Governor of Pennsylvania had gone so far as to appoint commissioners to receive it. The object of the amendment was to enable the States to take off parts of the road as it was finished. If toll-gates were not now erected, this could not be done. He hoped the Senator from Mississippi would withdraw his motion.

Mr. CLAYTON objected to the principle of the bill, and should vote against it. He had always been a warm friend to the system of internal improvements, and he had consequently hitherto voted for the formation of this road. It was now time, however, that the Senate should pause. The principle upon which this road had been established, was that of carrying out the contract of the Government with the States west of the Ohio river. They had gone on for many years in this path, and what were now the doctrines which they heard from the West? Why the State of Ohio, by its legislature, approved of that part of the President's message which would deprive his (Mr. C.'s) and other States of the benefit of the sale of the public lands. They were to receive no aid in return for what they were doing in favor of internal improvements. He disapproved of throwing the road into the hands of the States. They might make what charge they pleased at the toll-houses, and Congress would have no power to control them.

Mr. EWING said the honorable Senator from Delaware could not have read the provisions of law relative to this matter. It was not intended to give the States exclusive power over the road; they were only to be permitted to collect toll sufficient to keep the road in repair. He (Mr. E.) did not like the allusions which had been made to the conduct of the people of the West. He asked the Senator from Delaware to examine the votes of the Western members relative to improvements in the honorable Senator's own States—to look to the hundreds and thousands of dollars which had been there expended. He trusted that the Senator, when he reflected what was due to the East and to the West, would change his opinion. There had not been large sums appropriated by Government for the exclusive benefit of the West, nor would there be in this case. The road would be equally useful to the people of the East and to the people of the West; it was a medium of communication which would be equally for the interest of all; and, for the common interest, all ought to subscribe. He hoped the gentleman did not imagine that the West intended to withdraw its contribution from the appropriation of the General Government for purposes of similar improvement. He hoped the gentleman would withdraw his opposition.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN said, his principle inducement to vote for the measure was, that it was one of the substantial improvements made by the General Government. The country had now reached that stage in its history when the States were able to take the management of such improvements into their own hands. He regarded it as a national object, and whatever brought distant parts nearer together, facilitated the national interest, and ought to be persevered in. He hoped the bill would not be defeated. All ought to desire, whenever a work of the kind was commenced, that it should be done. The whole Union ought to join in forwarding the beneficial energy of the General Government. It was the part of Government to seek the affections of the people; and the best way of receiving the people's affections was, by showing them that they wished to do them good.

Mr. CLAYTON observed that the Senate was now considering a subject over which neither he nor the Senate had any control. The great principle was struck down by the President. He (the President) was resolved that no improvement should be made beyond tide water. If the Delaware breakwater were to be completed, and it was to be proposed to give it up to the State of Delaware, he would act upon that question as upon this—he would oppose it. The bill to throw the road into the hands of the States was a bill to tax it to the full amount of the repairs. And how much was that? It threw the road, in his opinion, into the jurisdiction of the States through which it passed. He was no enemy to public improvements—he had voted for several appropriations for that purpose. But he was called upon now to vote on a different subject—to throw the road into the hands of the States.

Mr. EWING was of opinion, that so long as the road remained the property of the General Government, appropriations must continually be made to keep it in repair, and to have officers appointed to carry on the work. The Senate must be aware that a public road could never remain in repair for six months, particularly in a mountainous country. The road must go out of use altogether. An appropriation must be made to put it in repair, and the States would keep it in repair; or it might be delivered to the States under a compact that they repair it. Forty years ago, eighty miles of the road were put in repair by the State of Ohio. It was taken by the State, and by the State kept in excellent repair, and was now the best road in the United States. The road on this side of the river had been suffered to go out of repair; application had been made, and money was voted, but no care had since been taken of it. But since it was placed under the control of the engineer department, the road was as well done, and the money as well applied, as in the state of things it could be. It was not the fault of the people of the West that the money was so applied. There was no danger of the road being taxed by the States, beyond what was necessary. They could apply the money for no other purpose than for the necessary repairs. We ought to carry into execution the compact made with the States. The road was to be given up to three States, to keep it in repair; but Congress might assume, at any time, its jurisdiction over it.

The Cumberland road was never a favorite object in Pennsylvania; but the universal sentiment on the original question as to the policy of making the road, has been lost sight of, and we must now keep it in repair. The reluctance, on the part of Congress, to keep the road in repair, was discovered, and Pennsylvania made a proposition to Congress to put the road in repair, and the State would then take it off our hands, and continue it in repair by means of tolls. Congress acceded to the proposition with the resolution that Congress might, at any time, resume its jurisdiction over the road. This amounted to a compact with these three States, as Congress had acceded to the propositions made by these States, to repair the road, and it was now too late to look back. If it was necessary to make the road, it was equally necessary to keep it in repair. One portion of the road between Washington and Wheeling was so much out of repair as to be entirely abandoned. The honorable Senator went into further particulars respecting the condition of the road, showing that it was good in some portions, and others almost or quite impassable, so that without repairs past appropriations would, to a great extent, be lost.

Mr. KANE said the amendment proposed to give $300,000 for repairing the Cumberland road, and the question now was, whether the amendment altered the character or principle of what the Senate had already adopted. When he heard the amount read, he was startled, and feared for the bill, when he recollected the view of Congress on the subject of erecting toll-gates; but it now appeared to him, that the amendment did not alter the principle of the bill. The objection to the amendment was, that it amounted to the idea that Congress were to erect toll-gates for the purpose of collecting tolls by their authority.

[Mr. POINDEXTER said that was not the idea; it was that of Congress authorizing the States to erect gates and collect tolls.]

Mr. KANE said, in Pennsylvania, Congress were required to repair the road and to erect toll-gates; but in Virginia, when the road had been received, commissioners were to be appointed and toll-gates erected, under the authority of the State; to this there was no objection in Virginia; and in Pennsylvania, the proposition was, that Congress should only erect the gates, and then give up the road to the State. Mr. K. could see no difference in the principle of the two cases; but if gentlemen would not vote to erect toll-gates, he was willing that part should be stricken out; but he thought it sufficient, that when the gates were erected, toll should be taken under the authority of the State.

The obligation of Congress to repair, stood on a contract to which every President had agreed, and to which there was no constitutional objection, though the acting President objected to the internal improvement system as a system. Did this furnish a reason why they should not vote for that bill? Or, in other words, should they coerce co-ordinate branches of the Government to adopt a general system, by opposition to this particular measure?

The Senator from Delaware had objected to the bill, because he went for internal improvement as a system, and because the bill placed the subject under the control of the States. It was not so; but suppose it was, Congress chose their own terms on which they would give up the road, and the States were to keep it in repair, so that it would be still held by the States under the Government. It was a mere question of policy, whether they should repair the road by the Government or the States. The temporary jurisdiction of the States over the road was one which they had not sought, but it had been forced upon them. According to the principle of the Senator, the Government must repair; and even if his objection was good, it had come too late, because Congress had established the principle; they had made the contract, and for their own interest, to get rid of expense; and, after this had been done, he would ask if they should object to the measure because the States would have the control?

Mr. TYLER stated the attitude of Virginia upon this question. She made no surrender of her ancient principles upon this occasion, but was as well prepared to battle against the system of internal improvement, as she had ever been. She would never accept this road with toll-gates; were she to do so, she would be recognising a jurisdiction which had no right to be exercised. A proposition had formerly been made to erect toll-gates, had received the sanction of both Houses, but had been vetoed by the President, (Mr. Monroe,) on the ground that the General Government had no authority over the soil of the States. The present case, Mr. T. said, came up in the same form as that to which he had alluded, and he should oppose it.

Mr. HENDRICKS said, in the hope that this difficulty could be obviated by some other construction of the law, he would withdraw the amendment which he had offered.

Mr. POINDEXTER said, this road was commenced under the administration of Mr. Jefferson, than whom no man could be more opposed to the internal improvement system of the Federal Government. The road was begun under the contract of the two per cents. but it was very soon found that the supply from this source was not sufficient to meet the expenditure. Congress, therefore, upon the faith of these two per cents. made larger appropriations than the sums which accrued yearly from the public lands, reserving, however, the two per cents. as a fund for the eventual reimbursement of the increased outlay. This fund would continue to be available to defray the expenses of the road as long as the public lands should remain in the market. The road was opened with the consent of all the States; Virginia, he believed, gave her positive consent to the measure. Congress afterwards determined upon surrendering it to Maryland, Pennsylvania, and Virginia, for certain specific purposes. These States took up the matter, deliberated upon it, and consented to receive the road for these specific purposes, with the proviso, however, that it should be put in repair before it came into their hands. For this purpose (the putting it in repair) appropriations had been granted during the last few years, with the perfect understanding that it was eventually to be received by the States. A great part of the road had been already repaired, and the large stones on the remainder had been taken up. The question now was, not as to the power of making internal improvements, but as to whether or not Congress should continue its exertions in repairing the road. They were bound to continue the repairs. They had offered the road to the States, and the States had agreed to receive it, and could Congress now go back from its engagement? The road was the great line of connexion between the Western country and this place. Almost every member from New Orleans and the Southwestern States came up the Ohio and stopped at Wheeling, on his route to the seat of Government. Refuse to put the road in repair, and this line of communication would be broken up. With regard to the observation of the Senator from Maryland, "that the States ought not to possess the power of raising taxes," he (Mr. P.) begged to say that there was no possibility of that being done in the present case. The tolls were very moderate, and were to be devoted entirely to the repair of the road. They were to constitute a road fund. If any surplus arose, it was to be placed in the Treasury, and kept there, till required for repairs. [Mr. P. here read a statement of the tolls to be taken, showing the charges for the various vehicles and animals passing along the road to be very moderate.]

Now, after having spent upwards of two millions of dollars upon the road, it had become useless for the transportation of the mail, or for any other purpose. He considered the question as judicial, whether there would be funds or not in the end, to reimburse Government. He would give his support to the bill.

Mr. PRESTON said, that, up to the year 1826, the appropriations to the Cumberland road amounted to one million seven hundred and twenty-six thousand dollars. Thus far, the experiment was paid for by the Government, and in two years afterwards, the road had cost two millions four hundred and forty-three thousand dollars, at the rate of about seventeen thousand dollars a mile. Experience showed at that time, that the road would be a very expensive undertaking. Another appropriation was made, and after its expenditure, the road was found to be in a worse state than it was before. Congress then made an additional appropriation of a hundred and thirty thousand dollars, for that part of the road which passed through Pennsylvania; and thirty-four thousand dollars for that part which ran through Virginia, to induce those States to take it. After the expenditure of these sums, the road was still worse, so as to require double the appropriation. The undertaking had been retrograding. It was like the school boy, who, when coming late to school, the master demanding of him the reason, declared that the roads were so slippery that for every step he attempted to take forward, he slid two back. And how, said the master,

SENATE.]

Cumberland Road.

did you arrive at all, under such circumstances? Why, said the boy, I turned round to face the other way, and by striving to get home again, arrived at school. What guarantee was there, that next year Congress would not be called upon for another appropriation of double the amount? The road had been surveyed, the bridges built, the excavations made, the graduations effected, and yet two thousand dollars per mile were wanted, to put it in a state of repair. That the public money should be thus expended, was no doubt a desirable thing. It was, no doubt, advantageous to Pennsylvania, to have so much of the public money thus expended within the limits of the State. He did not accuse Pennsylvania of any attempt to procure it; but the expenditure of the money there was nevertheless advantageous.

Gentlemen now wished to appropriate two hundred dollars a mile, after seventeen hundred had been already expended. For what purpose? Not to make a road for free passage, but to make a present of. It appeared to him that Government had made a bargain which it had better get clear of at once. Pennsylvania now stipulated for the erection of toll-gates, or she would not accept of it. There had been money enough laid out upon the road to justify the saying of a gentleman, who averred that the cost of the road would be found to be sufficient to pave it with metal; and it seemed to him as if there had been actually as much expended as would pave the road with iron, as some of the streets of London were paved.

But what guarantee was there that, after all the expenditure upon it, the road would be kept up? No doubt Pennsylvania would fulfil her engagement; but she had a contrary interest, and would you give her three hundred thousand dollars to sustain a road against her own interest? If the interests of that great State were connected with any other line, no doubt that other line would be established.

Who was to decide as to the state of the road? The officers of the Government; and it would be their interest not to decide until the road was in perfect order; so that if a single toll-gate wanted as much repair as would cost twenty-five cents, the road would be reported to be not in order. If Pennsylvania would stipulate for as much money as was necessary by estimation to complete the road through her territory, it would be the most advisable course. But she would make no such stipulation. There was now a large appropriation every year—a constant call upon the Treasury. Having given so much money, gentlemen argued that it ought not to be lost, and gave another appropriation, and yet the road was no better. It originally cost two millions of dollars, and, according to the engineer's report, it would now cost little less to repair it. It was perfectly clear that three hundred thousand dollars would not be sufficient; and if that was appropriated now, Congress would have to keep appropriating year after year. If the road was not worth supporting on the part of Pennsylvania, it was not worth supporting on the part of Congress. He would stipulate in the bill that the State, for an appropriation, should agree to make the road, or not have it at all. The gentleman from Pennsylvania was averse to a clay road. There was no stipulation for a clay road in the bill. He would object with him against a clay road. He should be unwilling that so large a grant as three hundred thousand dollars should be made—he could not give his assent; and felt himself compelled to vote against the bill.

Mr. BIBB said, he would vote for the appropriation for repairing the road, and for giving up its management to the States; the latter would be giving it where it properly belonged, and it would then be kept in good repair, and Congress would get rid of these applications for money. A small toll at each gate would keep the road fit for travelling. On this subject he did not depend on con-ture; part of the road had been accepted by the State of Ohio; and had been kept in repair, under a very moderate toll; and one who was acquainted with the subject had told him the requisite repairs had been less and less, and the legislature would exact no more toll than the very little which would soon be required to keep it in repair.

On this road Congress had expended upwards of $2,000,000, not without important use and benefit, not to a single State, but to many, not only to passengers and members of Congress, but for a communication to products and merchandise between the valley of the West and the Atlantic. Any gentleman who would travel that road between Cumberland and the Ohio, would not count less than four or five hundred loaded wagons. It was true the road was much out of repair, but it stood wonderfully where it was made as it was originally, so that stages and heavy wagons had passed over it for twenty years, without repair. But the pounded stone had been ground to dust in some places, and had left the large rocks bare, so as to make the road intolerable. Instead of the old foundation, the Macadam's plan was entirely adopted, so that the appropriation had not been sufficient; but now three hundred thousand dollars would go very far, if it would not be entirely sufficient to put the road in repair. Mr. B. went into a particular description of the state of the road.

He thought that in point of economy, as much for the convenience of the road, as in regard to future appropriations, to get clear of the begging of money, it was better to appropriate now a sufficient amount. He wanted to get clear of the road, and let the States take it; and the only way was to repair it, and let the States erect toll-gates. They ought not to doubt the fidelity of any State in the Union; it was an unsocial idea, which he would never harbor. The States were in difficulty when the constitution was adopted; and since that time the General Government itself had borrowed money and paid interest. But since the country had recovered from the effects of the revolutionary war, since commerce had expanded, and the States had emerged from their depressed condition, he had seen no reason to doubt their fidelity. He saw no difficulty, and he would act under the persuasion that Maryland, Pennsylvania, and Ohio, would do all that was or ought to be expected.

He would be very unwilling to have the intercommunication between Washington and the valley of the Mississippi broken in upon by the road going to ruin. It had been constructed over places extremely rough and difficult, and he thought it the best economy to make a moderate appropriation to put it in repair; how much would be sufficient he did not know; but many miles of the road did not require repair. He believed that, considering the part of the country, and the thin population, more than three hundred thousand dollars could not be profitably expended in any one year, and from experience they would be enabled to make a more profitable expenditure of money.

Mr. SOUTHARD said, he had felt great difficulty in his own mind in relation to the question now before the Senate, as to what was his duty; but he regarded the appropriation of three hundred thousand dollars, as not the concluding one; if that was made now, two or three hundred thousand dollars must be appropriated next year; and if he gave his vote now, he would repeat it next year or the subsequent year. He did not, as some members did, rest the appropriation on the ground of a final one. His difficulty was, whether he should go the whole length for if Congress were to make no more appropriations than this, it would be a good bargain. He foresaw additional appropriations, and yet he had brought his mind to rest for this, and he would tell his reasons. He had understood that the several States were willing to receive the road and keep it in repair without calling on Government.

APRIL 1, 1834.]

Cumberland Road.

[SENATE.]

Appropriations had been heretofore made for making it and keeping it in repair, and he was not much surprised at the amount, immense as it had been. It was a vast work at its commencement, and liable to be speedily out of repair.

Under these circumstances, much money was wanted; the only question was, whether the object to be gained was worthy the expenditure. He, Mr. S., had always thought it was, and such being his opinion, he had always been glad to see the appropriations made. Were they to surrender this undertaking? When he remembered the great objects Congress had in view, when they commenced this road; when he remembered what the road was—that it was the great line by which nine States approached the seat of Government—every feeling of regard for the national interests forbade that it should be given up. He, for one, would not surrender it. How then was it to be continued? They had felt the pressure of appropriations, and had attempted to avoid them by making the road support itself.

The question as to the collection of tolls was debated at length, and in a very animated manner, and Congress came to the conclusion of erecting toll-houses upon the road. Their intentions, however, in this particular, were defeated by the veto of the then President, who believed that the Government had no power to erect toll-houses. Congress could not continue the road, therefore, by the collection of tolls, and appropriations were obliged to be made to save it from annihilation. The expense thus incurred had been so heavily felt during the last few years, that Congress was induced to look round for some means of relief.

They could not put up gates themselves for the purpose of defraying the expense of the road, and therefore saw that they must either keep it in repair themselves by annual appropriations or surrender it to the States, who could erect toll-houses. The latter alternative was determined upon after much deliberation. The States consented to receive the road on condition that it should be placed in proper repair; it was at the time in such a state that it could not be travelled on. The first step then of the General Government, was to put the road in repair. They could not require the States themselves to do it; the road was a national object. Well, the present appropriation was required to continue these repairs; if it was not granted the road would be neglected; no one could interfere to preserve it; and it would be eventually annihilated. That this should be the case, he (Mr. S.) would never permit, as far as his vote could have any influence. The undertaking was a national one; it was one of those necessary bonds which served to bind together the hearts of the people of this Union. It had been said that the engagements which Government had made with the States might fail to be fulfilled. It might be so. But was he to act upon the supposition, that when Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia had pledged themselves to receive this road, they would violate their pledges? He would vote millions rather than act upon such a supposition. No! these States would fulfil their engagements to the letter; only put the road in repair, and his life upon it Maryland, Virginia, and Pennsylvania would not be found wanting in the fulfilment of that which they had promised.

The question in his mind was, whether this great undertaking should be surrendered or not. He had felt some difficulty in coming to a decision upon the subject, because the present appropriation might not be found sufficient; yet he had brought himself to vote for it. He went upon the belief that as soon as the road was ready, the States would take it and relieve the Treasury of the Union from such drafts as had hitherto been made upon it. He should ask that the question be taken by ayes and noes.

Mr. PRESTON desired to make an amendment, by striking out certain words.

The CHAIR decided that this could not be done.

Mr. PRESTON would then move to add, "providing the States of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia consent to receive those parts of the road which pass through their respective States when put in repair by this appropriation."

Mr. SOUTHARD said, that the effect of the amendment would be, to confine the appropriation to that part of the road which was within the States of Pennsylvania and Maryland, and to give no portion to Virginia.

Mr. PRESTON would have no objection to insert the State of Virginia.

Mr. WILKINS could give no hope that Pennsylvania could agree to a proposition of the kind. She looked on it as a national undertaking, in which she had as little to do as the State of South Carolina, or any other State. She had certainly less to do with it than Ohio. Most of the roads in Pennsylvania were toll roads, and brought in a revenue to the State. The State had an interest in her roads, but never looked upon this road as of any interest to her. It was therefore that she had asked Government to hang toll-gates. Would South Carolina hang toll-gates? Would Virginia hang toll-gates? The road was a national road, and consequently of as much interest to those States as to Pennsylvania. There was no doubt as to the integrity of Pennsylvania. To adopt the amendment would be to prevent the Government from making any repairs this season, and the want of repairs now would add fifty per cent. to the expense of repairs next year. If Congress meant to do any thing, now was the best time.

Mr. CLAY thought that if the amendment were adopted, it would defeat the object of the bill entirely. If the bill were to be passed, he hoped the Senate would reject the amendment. The honorable Senator from South Carolina had stated the great expenses which the undertaking had already incurred. It was true; but they arose mainly from the want of any constant method of keeping the road in repair. Twelve years ago toll-gates were proposed, and the people who used the road would be willing to pay. If toll-gates were hung, a sufficiency of money could be collected to keep the road in constant repair. He must say, in vindication of the act, that Government was more competent to erect the road than a corporate authority.

The road from Wheeling was erected at less than six thousand dollars per mile. Mr. C. went into a statement of the expenses of constructing several roads, and said, that if Government did not employ its own engineers, he would hesitate to vote so large a sum without some alteration. His own State had asked for an appropriation, which was not obtained. Last session it was proposed to appropriate the proceeds of the sales of the public lands for purposes of internal improvement, but the State of Illinois and some others voted against the measure. He would vote for the measure, in the hope that the gentleman would reconsider his views; and also from the conviction that Kentucky and other States, which held no public lands, ought to share in the benefits resulting from public improvements. He would not vote for the measure, but for the reservation that the General Government would retain a power over the road.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, inquired why Congress was asked to Macadamize the road when it was not in the original agreement. The road was once an admirable experiment, but not on the Macadam plan; it would be so as originally constructed, and the present appropriation, in that case, would not have exceeded $200,000; but if it were $300,000, with a view to have it well repaired, considerable more would still be required—and why? Because Pennsylvania would not receive it if it were not such a road as would never get out of repair. The provision was, that the road should be made in the manner it was originally begun, but it being a road of the United States, nothing was done, and for that reason the repairs were not made when they became necessary, and not at all till the road was ruined. But toll-gates would keep it in repair without difficulty. Pennsylvania had the same interest in three of her counties as in ten, and she was bound to accept the road and keep it open, not on the Macadam plan, but the original plan.

SENATE.] Cumberland Road.—Death of Mr. Blair, of S. C.—Chittenden (Vt.) Memorial. [APRIL 2, 1834.]

He could not be content to go on making such heavy appropriations. When they made an appropriation, with a perfect conviction that it would be sufficient, it uniformly turned out that it was not sufficient, but the road was worse than before. If reliance could be placed on those employed—the engineers of the United States—large stone would make the road permanent for several years; and if so, it could then be kept easily in repair by tolls.

To the supposed constitutional power of Congress he was opposed; he had voted against the toll bill of 1832, though there was but a small portion of the Senate against it; he was in a minority of seven, all Southern men but one. Virginia, on that occasion, was not with the South; she voted for toll-gates.

Mr. K. said he wished very much that this road should not be so entirely destroyed as to cut off the communication between Washington and the West, and the Government was not bound to go beyond the arrangement. The road beyond the Ohio differed in some degree from the part on this side, as it respected appropriations. These were new States, and stipulations had been made to construct roads through them by Congress; and when the public lands should be brought into market, the expense would be more than refunded. He hoped the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina would prevail.

Mr. KANE had voted against the land bill of the last session, for he thought Congress had not the power to appropriate money except for the benefit of the whole country. The bill proposed to give money to the States, to be appropriated by them; and his objection was simply this, that Congress had no right to substitute the several States for themselves, to appropriate money for the benefit of the people of the Union, according to their judgment.

Mr. EWING would say one word on the amendment. This appropriation was to be made provided the States would receive the road: but could it be done? An engineer must be sent, and the legislatures would not have time to act, and the effect would be, that the provision would be defeated; and if it was so for the present year, the consequence would be a larger appropriation next year.

The first proposition was made by the State of Ohio, and Government agreed to open the road to the Ohio river. Was this a contract? If the road were now permitted to go down, it would be keeping the word of promise to the ear only. The Senator from South Carolina had said that it was not worth the expenses; but the road was begun twenty-seven years ago, and had been of much use to the nation.

The amendment was now tried, and lost without a division.

On the question, Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time? the bill was lost by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Benton, Bibb, Clay, Ewing, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Kane, Kent, Linn, Morris, Poindexter, Porter, Prentiss, Robbins, Robinson, Silsbee, Southard, Tipton, Waggaman, Wilkins—20.

NAYS.—Messrs. Black, Brown, Calhoun, Clayton, Forsyth, Hill, King of Ala., King of Ga., Knight, Leigh, Mangum, Moore, Naudain, Preston, Shepley, Smith, Sprague, Swift, Tomlinson, Tyler, White, Wright.—22. So the bill was negatived.

The Senate then adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 2.

Mr. WHITE, one of the majority, moved a reconsideration of the vote taken yesterday on the rejection of the bill making appropriations for the repair and continuation of the Cumberland road; and, after a short desultory debate, in which Messrs. WHITE, CLAY, POINDEXTER, EWING, SPRAGUE, and KING of Alabama took part, Mr. PRESTON called for the yeas and nays; which having been ordered, the question was taken, and decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Benton, Clay, Ewing, Grundy, Hendricks, Kane, King of Alabama, Knight, Linn, McKee, Morris, Poindexter, Porter, Prentiss, Robbins, Robinson, Shepley, Silsbee, Smith, Southard, Sprague, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Tomlinson, White, Wilkins, Wright.—21.

NAYS.—Messrs. Brown, Calhoun, Hill, King of Ga., Leigh, Moore, Preston, Tyler.—8.

The bill was then re-committed to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

DEATH OF Mr. BLAIR, OF S. CAROLINA.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Franklin, their Clerk:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Wednesday, April 2d, 1834.

Ordered, That a message be sent to the Senate to notify that body of the death of JAMES BLAIR, late one of the Representatives from the State of South Carolina, and that his funeral will take place this day, at four o'clock in the afternoon, from the Hall of the House of Representatives.

The message having been read—

Mr. PRESTON said: I am sure the Senate will sympathize with me in those emotions of profound sorrow which I rise to propose the customary resolution upon such an event. The sudden death of General BLAIR, in the vigor of life, and in the midst of its most strenuous pursuits, cannot fail to impress all minds with the most solemn feelings—which to us are enhanced by his association with us in the same pursuits, and by the fact that this is the second instance this session of such an awful and sudden dispensation of Providence. We, his colleagues of the South Carolina delegation, lament his loss not the less that he has differed with us in some points of public policy. Such differences have never extended to personal separation; for each has excused the zeal of the other, by a mutual and equal acknowledgment of zeal, and God forbid that any such difference should impart for a moment the sad current of feeling which now passes through my heart. To whatever the deceased addressed himself, he brought uncommon force of character, firmness of purpose, and vigor of intellect. His country and his constituents have to mourn the loss of these qualities at this important juncture of our affairs; and upon me devolves the melancholy duty of moving the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Senate will attend the funeral of the Hon. JAMES BLAIR, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of South Carolina, at the hour of four o'clock this evening; and, as a testimony of respect for the memory of the deceased, they will go into mourning by wearing crape round the left arm for thirty days.

The resolution was then unanimously adopted; and, at the motion of Mr. PRESTON,

The Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, APRIL 3.

CHITTENDEN (VT.) MEMORIAL.

Mr. PRENTISS presented a memorial and resolutions from the county of Chittenden, in Vermont, remonstrating against the removal of the Government deposits from the Bank of the United States, and praying that the deposits may be restored, and the country relieved from the distress which has been brought upon it. Mr. P. said that the memorial and resolutions were adopted at a meeting of citizens convened without distinction of party, to consult and express their opinions upon the present embarrassed and alarming condition of the country. Neither the memorial nor the resolutions, said Mr. P., advance any new doctrines, nor state any facts of a character essentially different from those which have already been presented during the session, on the same subject and in the same form, from numerous other quarters, to the Senate. They represent the portion of the country from which they proceed, to be in a condition not less unfavorable than the condition of most other parts of the country from which we have heard; and they urge upon Congress the wisdom and necessity of discarding rash and dangerous experiments upon the currency, credit, and business of the community, and of adhering to the policy which has heretofore characterized the Government, and given peace, contentment, and happiness to the people. They maintain that credit is not only essential to the transaction of business, but has been an important and efficient agent in the advancement of the prosperity of the country, by giving activity to the operations of business, and enabling men of limited means, men with no capital but their integrity and labor, to acquire competence and wealth; and they insist that whatever tends to impair or obstruct credit, operates to repress the spirit of industry and enterprise, and is injurious to the general welfare. They also hold, that, while the State legislatures possess the power to incorporate banks, the currency of the country will be a paper currency, and that though such a currency, if founded on a specie basis, and properly regulated, has many advantages over a metallic circulation, it can be preserved sound, safe, and uniform, only by means of a national bank. The memorialists, sir, complain, that the currency is deranged, and credit destroyed; that business is suspended, and property depreciated; and they attribute the unexampled embarrassments and evils, under which the country is suffering, to the hostile position assumed by the administration in relation to the Bank of the United States; to the unjustifiable attack made upon the character and credit of that institution. They view the sudden withdrawal of the public deposits from the legally-established and authorized place of custody, and intrusting them to banks in no way responsible to Congress, not only as a measure palpably unnecessary, impolitic, and unjust, but as an attempt to change the whole money system of the country, and subject both the public treasure and the currency to the individual action and control of the Executive, in subversion of the legitimate functions and constitutional authority of the legislature. The meeting, sir, at which the memorial and resolutions were adopted, was attended, as I am informed, by not less than four hundred freemen. Among the number present were the most intelligent and respectable men in the county—not only men of extensive business, but prominent and leading men in the different political parties. It is worthy of notice, that the gentleman who acted as chairman of the meeting has been, for several years, the candidate of the friends of the administration for the office of Governor of the State. In addition to this, I am enabled to say, that the memorial and resolutions are characterized by respectful phrasing, by a tone of just moderation, and carry upon the face of them convincing proof of the public spirit and rectitude of purpose of those from whom they emanated.

The memorial was then read, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

UNION BANK OF MARYLAND.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented the following communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, responsive to Mr. CLAY's resolution of the 31st March:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, April 3d, 1834.

SIR: In obedience to the resolution of the Senate of the 31st ultimo, requiring the Secretary of the Treasury, "to report to the Senate what amount of public money is now on deposit in the Union Bank of Maryland, when and on what account it was deposited, and also, whether any Treasury drafts, contingent or other, have been, during the month of March, 1834, furnished to the said bank, or at any time heretofore, to the Bank of Maryland, for any and what purpose. And that he likewise report what amount of stock in the capital of the said Union Bank was held by R. B. Taney, Esq., when the said bank was selected as one of the banks to receive on deposit the public money, and what amount of the said stock he now holds," I have the honor to transmit herewith a statement (marked A to U) of the public money deposited in the Union Bank of Maryland, showing when it was deposited, and on what account. The difference between the balance to the credit of the Treasurer, in his statement, and in that furnished by the bank, arises from warrants which have been issued by the Treasurer on the bank, but which have not yet been presented for payment, and a deposit to his credit since the last weekly return.

No Treasury drafts, contingent or other, were furnished to the Union Bank of Maryland, during the month of March, 1834. And no transfer draft of any description, contingent or other, has ever been furnished to the Bank of Maryland, since I came into office. In answer to that part of the resolution which calls for information as to the amount of stock held by Roger B. Taney in the Union Bank of Maryland, "when the said bank was selected as one of the banks to receive in deposit the public money, and what amount of the said stock he now holds," I have the honor to state, that, inasmuch as the inquiry does not embrace the stockholders generally, but is confined to the stock of a particular individual, it must, by necessary implication, be understood as pointing the inquiry to the motives which influenced the individual named in the transactions he may have had in the stock of the said bank—and under such circumstances, it is due to his official relations to the Senate and to the public, that his motives in any such transactions should be fully and clearly disclosed. I therefore transmit to the Senate a copy of a letter from this Department to the president of the Union Bank of Maryland, dated the 31st day of March, 1834, apprising him of the information required by the Senate, requesting him to forward to the Department, a statement of the amount of stock in the Union Bank of Maryland, held by Roger B. Taney, at the time the deposits were removed—time at which it was purchased—and the amount now held by him—and the original private letter of Roger B. Taney, authorizing him to sell certain shares of stock which were lately sold.

Also, the letter from the president of the Union Bank of Maryland, in reply, dated April 1st, 1834, enclosing the statements and papers above mentioned, which are herewith transmitted, and are as follows:

1. The statement of the cashier, showing that at the time of the selection of the said bank as one of the banks to receive in deposit the public money, Roger B. Taney held in the stock of the said bank, seventy-one full shares and four half shares, the par value of which amounted to $5,475. That the last of these shares were purchased by him on the 12th of May, 1831, before he received any appointment under the Government of the United States; and that he now holds sixty-three full shares of stock in the said bank, showing that eight full shares and four half shares which were held by him at the time the deposits were removed, were sold and transferred on the 20th February, 1834.

2. The original private letter of Roger B. Taney, of the 18th February, 1834, to the president of the Union Bank, directing so many shares to be sold, for the purpose of paying the debt therein mentioned, as might be necessary for that purpose, and the balance of the shares to be returned to him; and the affirmation of the president of the Union Bank that he sold, under the power of attorney mentioned in that letter, eight full shares and four half shares, and returned to Roger B. Taney a certificate of the remaining one share. The letter states the certificate sent to the president of the bank at nine full shares; the affirmation of the president of the bank shows that it contained nine full shares and four half shares, the half shares being omitted in the letter, but included in the power of attorney to sell.

I also transmit herewith the original letter, dated 15th February, 1834, from Somerville Pinkney, Esq., of the city of Annapolis, the counsel for the creditor to whom the debt was due from Roger B. Taney, as trustee, requesting the payment of the said debt.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

R. B. TANEY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

HON. MARTIN VAN BUREN,
Vice President of U. S., and President of the Senate.

Mr. CLAY briefly explained, that, in consequence of the return made of the stockholders of the Union Bank of Maryland, in which the name of R. B. Taney appeared as stockholder, he had thought it but justice to the public that it should be ascertained what amount of stock was held by Mr. Taney in this bank. It was a mere fact which was called for, and nothing had been dropped, when the call was made, on the subject of motives. When the people had the facts before them they would be able to make their own inferences. He had not thought it proper that the name of Mr. Taney should be sent forth to the world as a stockholder, without further information. Mr. C. moved that the communication be printed; which was agreed to.

BATH (ME.) MEMORIAL.

Mr. SPRAGUE presented a memorial of the citizens of Bath, in Maine.

Mr. S. said that this was a memorial on the all-absorbing subject which had occupied the Senate for so many months, and to which Senators now lent such an unwilling ear, as led him almost to believe that their hearts had become callous to the sufferings of the community, as they increased in intensity. The memorial was signed by upwards of 300 of the citizens of Bath, State of Maine, who represent that this infliction on the country, in its travels to the Northeast, had reached them, and that they were now feeling its disastrous effects; that they were now increasing, and that every indication as to the future gave them reason to apprehend they would be still more and more severe. They had before them, in prospect, as they express it, the utter prostration of business, bankruptcy, and ruin.

The cause of their not having felt, before this time, the distress of which they now complain, would be readily understood, when it was considered that the State of Maine was, during the winter season, in a great measure cut off from commercial communications with other States by the bond of nature, in which they are locked. As the spring opened their business soon commenced, and they felt most severely the effects of a general prostration of business in other parts of the Union. Although he, Mr. S., had reason to believe that the demand for money might be less in the commercial cities soon, than it had been, yet he could not flatter himself that his constituents would be relieved from the distress consequent upon the derangement of the currency, under which they were now laboring, and of which they complain; because their sufferings arose from the general paralysis which now afflicted the commercial community. It is the want of a demand for the articles they supply, and the labor they furnish, which caused them to feel the present pressure.

So long as the derangement of the currency continued, however abundant money might be in the hands of capitalists, there would be an unwillingness to part with it, and there would be a deficiency of supply, not for the want of business operations, but because no man could borrow money from the capitalist to aid the views of those who were engaged in enterprise. He would say that their business was prostrated—was in the most disastrous condition. The memorialists, he repeated, said that they were suffering much, and apprehended, as he (Mr. S.) conceived with good reason, that they were to suffer still more severely. They consequently beseeched Congress to afford them some relief; at the same time they expressed their opinion that the derangement of the currency was owing to the Executive action—to its attack upon the Bank of the United States; and the course necessarily pursued by it when thus assailed by the Civil Magistrate. They expressed their opinion that the renewal of the charter of the present bank, or the establishment of some other institution which shall perform the necessary functions in relation to the currency, is indispensable to secure to it a sound and healthy state, and enable men to transact their business with more convenience to themselves. They left it to Congress to select between those two courses; being of opinion that a bank is particularly advantageous to the laboring classes and the active business men of the community, enabling them, when without capital, having their integrity, their activity, and industry, which was their capital, to depend upon, to avail themselves of the security for these calculations, offered by a national bank.

The memorial was then read, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

FANEUIL HALL RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. BENTON rose to present the resolutions adopted by the friends of the administration, and opponents of the United States Bank, at their great meeting in Faneuil Hall, on the 14th of March last. He said, that in the great multitude of petitions, memorials, and resolutions which had been presented to the Senate, few, if any, ever came forward with more imposing claims to the respectful consideration of the Senate. They came from a city, great in itself, and greater still in the commerce which enriches it—the arts and literature which adorn it—and the historic recollections which illustrate it. They came from a large portion of the population of that ancient city—5,000 being computed to be within the walls and 2,000 without—making a mass of 7,000 citizens, whose voices were united and imbedded in these resolutions. They were adopted on a spot sacred to American history, and memorable for scenes of patriotic impulse—in that Faneuil Hall, whose name alone imparts an interest to every thing which emanates from it.

These resolutions, said Mr. B., are twenty-eight in number. They embrace all the points which have grown out of the question which has occupied and engrossed the public attention since the meeting of Congress; and are full and explicit in approving the conduct of the President and Secretary of the Treasury, and in condemning the conduct of the United States Bank. Concerning as he heartily did, in the sentiments expressed by these resolutions, he felt a particular gratification in being the organ of their communication to the Senate. They could be read, and would speak for themselves; and would show that any attempt on his part to add to their power, and power, would be vain and nugatory. He should not make the attempt—he should not pretend to go over ground so fully occupied and so ably explored; but would take leave to make a few remarks on some points

Faneuil Hall Resolutions.

[SENATE.]

mentioned in the resolutions, either of a more general application, or of a nature not to be sufficiently illustrated in the limited scope of a resolution.

Mr. B. remarked upon the identity of the scene which was now presented with the one which was witnessed at the approaching termination of the first bank charter in 1811, when there was no removal of deposits to be charged with the distresses of the country. All the machinery of alarm and distress was in as full activity at that time as at present, and with the same identical effects. Town meetings—memorials—resolutions—deputations to Congress—alarming speeches in Congress. The price of all property was shown to be depressed. Hemp sunk in Philadelphia from $350 to $250 per ton; flour sunk from $11 a barrel to $7 75; all real estate fell 30 per cent.; 500 houses were suspended in their erection; the rent of money rose to 1 ½ per month on the best paper. Confidence destroyed—manufactories stopped—workmen dismissed—and the ruin of the country confidently predicted. This was the scene then; and for what object? Purely and simply to obtain a re-charter of the bank—surely and simply to force a re-charter from the alarm and distress of the country; for there was no removal of deposits then to be complained of, and to be made the scape-goat of a studied and premeditated attempt to operate upon Congress through the alarms of the people and the destruction of their property. There was not even curtailment of discounts then. The whole scene was fictitious; but it was a case in which fiction does the mischief of truth. A false alarm in the money market produces all the effects of real danger; and thus, as much distress was proclaimed in Congress in 1811—as much distress was proved to exist, and really did exist—then as now; without a single cause to be alleged then, which is alleged now. But the power and organization of the bank made the alarm then; its power and organization make it now; and fictitious on both occasions; and men were ruined then, as now, by the power of imaginary danger, which in the moneyed world, has all the ruinous effects of real danger. No deposits were removed then, and the reason was, as assigned by Mr. Gallatin to Congress, that the Government had borrowed more than the amount of the deposits from the bank; and this loan would enable her to protect her interest in every contingency. The open object of the bank then was a re-charter. The knights entered the list with their visors off—no war in disguise then for the renewal of a charter under the tilting and jousting of a masquerade scuffle for recovery of deposits.

That the real object of all this alarm in the country—all this pressure upon some parts of the country—for the section south of the Potomac had enjoyed a remarkable exemption—he was permitted to believe was to secure the re-charter of the bank. Such must have been the design of the bank; and the manner in which the bill for the re-charter was brought forward, and then laid over, certainly favored the idea. It was brought forward under an agonizing cry of distress, and a vehement appeal for immediate relief from actual, insufferable distress. It was then laid down that it might not interfere with another debate; that other debate came to a close in two days; then the bill, which was fixed for the first of May, was taken up to be fixed again for the 21st of April; and before the 21st of April comes, a set of important elections will take place in the two great States of New York and Virginia. Thus, after working the machinery of alarm for three months, and filling the Union with cries for the restoration of the deposits, the bank suddenly presents a demand for a re-charter; and then adjourns that demand, urgent as it might be, until certain important elections were over!

Mr. B. remarked upon the political character of this bank. He said it was born a political institution, and was the first measure of the Government to develop the line which so long and so distinctly marked the political parties of this country. The creation of this bank went to the origin of party. It went to the source where parties should be formed—to principles, to great and fundamental principles in the administration of the Government. It involved the question of constructive, and of granted powers; and was the entering wedge to all the implied powers afterwards assumed by Congress. Prohibitory tariffs—local internal improvement—and the whole American system. He said the bank was the head of the American system, and if it was re-chartered, it would re-establish that system in greater power and glory than it ever possessed. That it would do so, was proved, he said, by what it was now doing—struggling for those deposits which were the fruit of the high tariff policy—struggling for money which many gentlemen held to have been unconstitutional levied, and therefore, not levied at all, but taken tortuously. He warned gentlemen who were opposed to the American system, not now to re-establish this eldest and strongest member of that system; and which, if re-established, would certainly set up the whole family again; especially that high tariff which furnished her with those surpluses of revenue, for the keeping of which she now shows such an invincible inclination.

Mr. B. remarked upon the resolution which spoke of the exclusion of the Government directors from a knowledge and participation in the affairs of the bank, for the purpose of reminding the American people that there were no Government directors at this time in the bank. The institution, in its management, was now a mere private affair, governed by the directors of the individual stockholders; wielding and using the money, the name, the character, and the influence of the United States, precisely as they pleased. The immense power which the Government had put into the hands of the bank, was now used independently of the Government; and in the absence of directors, it became a matter of the highest moment to the people to have a thorough investigation into the affairs of the bank, to see how far its tremendous powers had been used for good, or for evil; for favor, or affection; for the relief, or oppression of the American people. Until that examination was made, and especially in the absence and exclusion of the Government directors, it was certainly an extraordinary case of presumption for the bank to come forward and demand a re-charter.

The equality of the State banks with the branches of the Federal bank, as places of deposit for the public moneys, as mentioned in one of the resolutions, was next adverted to by Mr. B. He did it for the purpose of remarking that the strong and conclusive argument against the assumption, that the Federal bank was the Federal Treasury, growing out of the 14th fundamental article of the constitution of the bank, could no longer escape public attention. The notice which was taken of it in such a meeting, and such a place, would ensure it a general and conspicuous regard in time to come.

Mr. B. referred to another of the resolutions, as claiming a particular notice, because it had a reference to a great practical measure now depending before the Senate, and which he hoped would end in legislative action. It was the one which related to the reform of the currency—the real currency of the constitution—by enlarging the specie circulation, and diminishing the paper circulation, within the United States. This was the true way to reform the currency. Let Congress raise gold to its just value, and restore it to its ancient place of current money among the people; let it repeal all its unwise, if not unconstitutional laws against the circulation of foreign coins; let it get rid of its own unwise legislation, and permit the enterprise of the people, and the commerce of the country, to take their course in bringing in coin, and the country will immediately fill up with the precious metals. Small bank notes will become odious to every body; they will be suppressed by the power of the people through the action of the Federal and State legislatures; and labor will receive its appropriate reward in a currency really sound, intrinsically valuable, dependent upon no contingency for its safety, and susceptible of being used with due regard to a beneficial economy.

Mr. B. had listened with great satisfaction to the various declarations which had come from the other side of the House, as to the prosperity of the country previous to the removal of the deposits in October last. A state of unparalleled felicity and prosperity was affirmed to exist in the country. The memorials which were introduced upon the same side of the question, were equally full, copious, and glowing, in describing the happiness of the people, and the prosperity of their affairs, up to that period. According to all their representations, a state of Arcadian felicity seemed to be prevailing up to that time in this country—in this same country, which, according to incessant predictions for nine years, was to be covered with ruin and desolation if General Jackson was elected President! Mr. B. said, it was not for so small an object as raising contrasts, or exciting disagreeable recollections, that he referred to these prophecies, so profusely made, for so long a period, and now so publicly contradicted by the whole body of the prophets themselves. A higher and nobler object animated him—an object connected with the safety and the good of the country. He wished, by recalling the recollection of these unfortunate predictions, to inspire distrust, if possible, in those who make them; if not in those who hear them. Those who have been so greatly mistaken heretofore, ought to admit the possibility of their being mistaken once more, and should adhere with less confidence to their predictions of ruin, if the Federal bank is allowed to expire. Those who have heard these predictions, and believed in them, and acted upon them, should now be careful how they believe and act again upon new prognostications from old sources which have led them into so much error heretofore. They should hesitate before they believe in a prediction of ruin to the country from the dissolution of this bank, coming from the same prophets who so long prophesied ruin to the country from the election of General Jackson; and who have been employed for three months past in proclaiming the happiness of the country under his administration. They will doubtless be as much mistaken in time to come, as they have been in time past; and should no longer put faith in predictions which have been so delusive and deceptive.

Mr. B. then moved that the resolutions be read, printed, and take the usual reference to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BIBB said, it was well known that he was not one of those who, in his course in the Senate, had been actuated by any desire to renew or prolong the charter of the Bank of the United States; but he could not suffer some of the observations of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BROWN] to pass unnoticed, because they were calculated to attribute to some of the members of the Senate, sentiments and motives they had never avowed or entertained; for it has been suggested, said he, that whilst we protest against the re-charter of the Bank of the United States, the bill has been suffered for the last three weeks to remain without objection, for political purposes. Now he might be permitted to observe this much as to political effect, that there was now no object to be gained, except so far as a statement of facts should go forth to the world. From 1807 to 1810, the country was laboring under great pecuniary embarrassment—for he was on the floor of the Senate when we were distinguished by that terrapin policy which produced the embargo, and finally resulted in a war. Then the money market was embarrassed to a considerable degree, there was a reduced demand for every article of trade, and the effect was, as it is not denied, a limited demand for exchange. This the gentleman attributed to alarm: he attributed it to facts, for it was well known that a severe pressure and distress was felt by the property-holders from one end of the country to the other. What then? Why the old Bank of the United States was got rid of with his hearty concurrence, and the result was a litter of banks springing up like the progeny of the dragon's teeth, or that of the fabulous hydra. He would ask if we had not reason now to apprehend like consequences? Would gentlemen say that there was not now a superabundance of State bank capital? Fifty-four banks in one State, with a capital of 12,000,000 of dollars, and but a small amount of specie to sustain them. To counteract this state of things, a re-charter of the Bank of the United States was proposed—and the proposition to re-charter was laid on the table, not with a design for political effect, but because the author of the measure av he could not carry a sufficient majority with him, and like a prudent general, retreated. Let us, said he, look a little farther back. When the war was closed, and credit was destroyed, a national bank was proposed, and it was called a political bank. Well, he was not here at the time, but he had some recollection of the history of that period. Who was it that made the war? Why, it was that great body of politicians to whose party he belonged. Both Houses of Congress were then filled with republicans, who set their faces against the assumption of unauthorized power. By looking back it would be seen, that without the concurrence of President Madison, this bank never could have been made. It was, in fact, a bank made by the republican party—by that party who had sustained the war—who had raised armies and navies to carry it on—and who, at the conclusion of the war, after having made the bank, principally owned the stock, because the wealthy portion of the nation had refused to sustain the war. One-fifth part of the subscriptions only were paid in specie, the rest having been subscribed for in Government stock. Could any man doubt that Mr. Jones, the first president of the bank, was a republican? Can gentlemen forget that the majority who passed the bank charter were republicans? In process of time, the stock of every bank, as in the case of this one, will get into the hands of those who do not want to use their capital otherwise than to get the highest interest on it; and these were always the more anxious for a regular and orderly Government. But the stock will get into the hands of the more wealthy—those who want to live on their wealth; and if you make a bank, the stock, as well as the direction of it, will naturally find its way to the hands of such persons. When the Bank of the United States was on the verge of bankruptcy, many of the State banks went down, while some remained on the hands of those who lived on the proceeds of their honest labor, and gave value received for the stock—but there was a great shock to banking credit—the Bank of the United States was in an alarming condition—and he was, therefore, neither friendly to a national bank nor to the State institutions. He believed that the whole system of banking was entirely vicious, liable to storms and tempests, and oppressive to the great body of the people. These were his views, and instead of turning to the Bank of the United States, he thought we should turn our attention to a much greater evil—the excessive issue of paper money. The country was inundated with bank paper, which was in the hands of the honest and industrious, who had given value received for it; and shall Government, who possesses the power, suddenly knock down the whole system, causing ruin and distress far and wide? The question should be left to public opinion, which would in good time work out the cure. He did not design to enter into a defence of the United States Bank; but it ought to be remembered that on a like amount of capital, wealth and influence would have the same effect in the State banks as in the Bank of the United States; for you can no more separate wealth and influence from power, than you can separate the shadow from the body. Did any man doubt this? The man of large capital will have more influence at an election than the man not worth a dollar, as has been abundantly proved by all history. That Government influence should be added to bank influence, was much to be regretted; but the danger was far greater when the influence of Government was with the State banks, than when added to a national institution. The danger from excessive issues of paper was increasing to an alarming extent, for no sooner was the Bank of the United States about to expire, than the State bank capital is augmented by millions. He believed from these indications that the interposition of some power was necessary to enforce that provision of the constitution which declares that no State shall issue bills of credit. Unless something like this was done, the increase of bank capital will be going on until a general bankruptcy is the result. Mr. B. concluded by saying, that he protested against gentlemen's attributing to him any wish to re-charter the bank, because he advocated the restoration of the deposits to that institution. He was simply influenced by those motives which should induce the Government, as well as every citizen, honestly and justly to fulfil the obligations they had entered into.

[SENATE.]

Mr. BENTON rose in brief reply to the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. BRAN.] He said that he hoped he had kept himself both within the bounds of truth and of parliamentary practice, in what he had said relative to the deferred re-charter bill. That bill was certainly brought forward under a great press of urgent necessity—of immediate action—to relieve the distresses of the country. After some debate, it was laid upon the table until the first of May, that its discussion might not interfere with a debate of prior origin. That debate, of prior origin, ceased in two days; and then the re-charter bill was called up, not for action—that immediate action which the distresses of the country were supposed to require when it was first brought forward—but to be fixed for discussion for the twenty-first of April—a period of time which would certainly cover important elections in the two great States of Virginia and New York. It was not for him, Mr. B., to assign motives for this delay—it was sufficient that he should state facts; but he might be permitted to suggest a doubt as to the correctness of the motive assigned for the mover of the bill, by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. BRAN.] The Senator supposed it was from a conviction of the impossibility of getting his bill through, that he had delayed it; he, Mr. B., thought the contrary, for the natural consequence of such a conviction would have been to move the indefinite postponement of his bill; at all events, to let it remain at the later period to which it was already fixed, namely, first of May; but he had shortened that period, he had fixed it for an earlier day, and that certainly indicated, not a conviction that he should lose the bill, but a hope that he should carry it.

In the allusion which he had made to the political character of the Bank of the United States, Mr. B. did not refer to the party designations of the day. They were too much qualified by ephemeral and subaltern distinctions, to stand for national denominations. He did not use the term federal or republican; for in these times those terms have lost their significance—they no longer indicate the true original grounds of the national parties—those grounds which were worthy to divide a nation—grounds on which patriots stood—and patriots divided in 1791—grounds which went to the fundamental principles of the action of the Government, and which drew the great line between those who were for a Government of constructive powers and delegated powers. The political drama, Mr. B. said, was now strangely confused. Many men have got into wrong places. They wear the name of one party, and act on the principle of the other. Parties, as the Senator from South Carolina who sat farthest to his left, [Mr. PASSMORE,] had well said, the description was meant for only one party—were now strangely checkered—they were ringed, streaked, and speckled. This was their state now; but this bank question, carrying all back to the year '91—ascending to the true fountain of party distinction—would set all right, and come back to the two plain colors, which would be a true index to every one's political principles. Bank or no bank, will be the question for years to come. That question will involve the question of constructive and delegated powers; it would involve the question, Mr. B. believed, of constitution or no constitution; for the construction which could let in this bank, with all its various breaches of the constitution, would make a breach in it wide enough to let in every other unconstitutional measure, which the varying times, and the passions or interests of parties might seem to require. Mr. B. then read an extract from a speech of a son of Virginia, and a son-in-law of Mr. Jefferson, made at the attempted renewal of the first bank charter, to confirm and establish the political importance and the political character which he had ascribed to the United States Bank. It was the speech of the late Mr. Eppe, and was a valuable piece of historical truth and political doctrine.

"The charter of the bank was granted in 1791. On this great measure the two great parties were, for the first time, arrayed against each other. It was at that time considered a party question, inasmuch as it involved the very principles on which the party divided, to wit, delegated powers, and constructive powers. Unfortunately for his country, General Washington, on this occasion, took side with the federalists. The creation of a moneyed interest, connected with the Government, was a favorite measure of those who were willing to ingraft energy on the constitution, and was warmly opposed by the party, unwilling to add, by construction, the extraneous right of a moneyed capital, to a constitution considered, on a fair construction, sufficiently energetic. The defeat of General St. Clair took place in the November following the establishment of the bank; and the subsequent disasters of the Indian war, by increasing the wants of the Government, drew more closely the ties of connexion between the federal party and the bank. Through all the periods of the federal administration, this moneyed power was their shield and their sword."

Mr. SILSBEE asked to have the names to the memoria printed.

Mr. BENTON observed that the proceedings which he had introduced were the resolutions of the meeting. They were duly signed by the president and secretaries. A letter to himself from the same gentlemen, stated the number at the meeting to be estimated at 7,000, namely, 5,000 within the walls of the building, and 2,000 without.

The resolutions were then read, ordered to be printed, and referred.

Mr. WRIGHT gave notice that he should to-morrow, as soon as he could obtain the floor, move the Senate to take up his motion for leave to introduce the report of the minority of the select committee, to whom was referred the credentials of the honorable Messrs. ROBBINS and POTTER for a seat upon the floor of the Senate.

Mr. WRIGHT moved that the Senate proceed to Executive business; which, upon a division, was lost.

The Senate then proceeded to the special orders of the day, and disposed of several bills, resolutions, &c.; among which—

The resolution of Mr. POINDEXTER authorizing the preparation of manuscript maps of the country in which public lands lie, was taken up and adopted.

The report and resolution of the Committee on the a legislative body, he would be bound to say that the report would not be received.

Mr. C. then related a circumstance of a somewhat similar nature, which occurred in 1831, when a gentleman from South Carolina made a report on behalf of the majority of the committee, and a gentleman from New Jersey, on the part of the minority. Both of these reports were received and printed. The consequence was, that the majority insisted upon a rejoinder, which was received and printed also. This was one of the evils which arose from the practice. If the gentleman would prepare his argument, he was willing to hear it. He would indulge the minority in an exhibition of their views, and he would be happy to have an opportunity of reading the views of the Senator; but he understood that the accompanying documents were so voluminous as probably to occupy several hundred pages.

Mr. POINDEXTER said, when the subject was under consideration by the committee, a proposition was made to the other parties to hear their reasons, founded on the charter and the proceedings and laws of the legislature of Rhode Island; but the honorable member who constitutes the minority, had referred to the whole argument of the report, and had quoted a number of passages. He had also introduced the documents on which they acted in deciding the question. Suppose the committee had employed a stenographer, and had taken down the speeches of the honorable gentleman from Rhode Island, would they have been considered as a part of the report? The committee had drawn their own conclusions from documents, according to the views of their own minds, and the documents were not laid before the Senate, yet, here they had references from A to K. It would be doubtless a waste of the public money to print these arguments; they might as well receive a volume of speeches, and have it printed as the documentary proceedings of the Senate. He considered the report of the committee as resting, not on speeches, but on the documentary history of the country, especially of Rhode Island. He might receive aid from luminous arguments, but he would not imbody parts of speeches in a report, as was now proposed. He was opposed to printing this paper in extenso, unless it should be printed without the speeches.

Mr. P. objected to making the proceedings of the committee controversial; if they were made so, the argument would be before the Senate, instead of the committee. He had found all these minority reports, as they were called, to contain original views on facts and documents. He had not noticed any instance of taking up the report of the majority to show it was wrong. If the Senator might reply to the report, Mr. P. might do so to him, and he might again reply. If it were such a paper as the Senator from Delaware had described, he would receive it; but it was no such paper. The paper of Mr. Dickerson, on the petition from Philadelphia, had not the slightest reference to the majority report, except to say that it differed in its conclusion. If this paper had been such, he would have accepted it at once. He was willing that the gentleman should be indulged in presenting his own conclusions from facts, as the majority had done. He thought it would be a bad and dangerous precedent to receive this paper, though he would not object to its publication, so far as he had already mentioned; it would be a precedent that would lead to incalculable mischiefs; even the minority of the minority might be at liberty to reply to the report of the majority. If it should be printed, he hoped the speeches would be excluded, for he could not conceive how they should constitute a part of the documentary history of the Senate.

Mr. SOUTHARD asked whether it was in order to receive this paper, according to parliamentary rules.

The CHAIR said the motion to receive was in order.

Mr. SOUTHARD'S difficulty about it was, that the whole practice was not according to established usage. He had not been aware of the example, at a former session, alluded to by the Senator from Delaware; but he remarked the operation of this thing in the other House. He recollected very well that the bank committee made majority and minority reports, and then a member made a different report, so that they had three reports on the same subject, and by the same committee. This seemed a strange proceeding, and not in conformity at all with parliamentary rules or proceedings. It appeared so; and, in the present case, if the minority report should be received, they might receive as many papers as there were dissentient opinions. The conclusion was clear, that, on the principle laid down in the case of Mr. Dickerson, this paper ought to be rejected. It was no matter what it was called, paper or report; it was a paper intended to supply the place of a report, and was a report, whatever the name. The practice would lead to confusion, and it was not needed; sufficient would be obtained without admitting this species of report. One of the necessary consequences attendant upon the practice, would be that the committee itself ought to be permitted to answer the report of the minority. Suppose then, a committee of seven were appointed, a majority of whom agreed upon a report, whilst the minority came among themselves—each member of the minority expressing peculiar and separate views; well, if these members of the minority were permitted to make reports, the majority of the committee must, or at least ought, for common justice, to be permitted to make a reply. It was better, therefore, to adhere to parliamentary rule, and decide that these papers could not be received. He thought there would be any shutting out of light by the course he recommended—if he thought the public would be prevented from getting all the facts of the case, he would go as far as possible the other way. He and those who thought with him upon this subject, could have no other interest on this occasion than to prevent confusion.

Mr. FORSYTH said he was afraid the attempt to prevent confusion would create it. He did not see any difficulty in the reception by the Senate of reports of this kind. Supposing the Senate should refuse to receive them, what was to prevent the parties from having them printed in the Journal. They had only to propose these reports as resolutions. The fact of the question turned upon whether these reports should be printed in the Journal, or in the Journal of the Senate. The object desired was, that the minority should present their views in such a form as would enable any member to peruse and consider them in his own chamber. He would make motion for the purpose of effecting this object; he would move that the report be laid on the table, and printed for the use of the members.

Mr. POINDEXTER was opposed to the printing, because at least half a dozen speeches were referred to in the report. The document itself was a perfect novel. He defied any person to prove that any paper had been received in reply to the expressed views of the majority of a committee. He should be happy to have the views of the Senator from New York, upon the paper which had been before the committee; but if the report which had been presented by the honorable Senator received, he (Mr. P.) would move that the majority be permitted to reply to it.

Mr. CLAY approved of the motion of the Senator from Georgia; if that motion were agreed to, the object of minority would be attained, and no precedent would be established in favor of the reception of these papers in the future.

Mr. WRIGHT asked that the report might be received, thinking it would prove the best reply to some objections which had been made during the morning.

APRIL 7, 1834.]

Rhode Island Senator.—Salem (Mass.) Memorial.

[SENATE.]

Mr. FORSYTH said, his object in moving to print, was to avoid the reading of the memorial.

Mr. BENTON thought the Senate ought to go as far as this case as precedents would carry them. Now, there were several instances in which papers of this kind had been received. The report of Mr. Adams, for example, which formed a considerable volume; and then followed other documents. Mr. Adams gave documents in his report, to the amount of fifty-two in number. To exemplify the facts, Mr. B. referred to document No. 13, which contained twenty-four recitations of evidence, and others which contained various numbers; and the quantity of documental matter which was printed with a report of a minority, contained infinitely more matter than the original report. He need not go farther than to suggest the inconvenience which would arise from the system.

Mr. CLAYTON observed that, if the Senate were to have reports of minorities, or papers in lieu of them, he did not see the necessity for printing the documents along with them. They might be referred to in the Secretary's office.

Mr. WRIGHT said the course adopted by the committee to arrive at the facts, was to call on the parties for facts, to avoid the necessity of sending to Rhode Island or masses of facts. He here entered into a description of part of the evidence in his report.

Mr. SPRAGUE said, that if the views of the honorable senator from New York [Mr. WRIGHT] were printed and incorporated with the documents of the Senate, the case would be substantially the same as if they were received by the Senate. He thought, the other day, that the precedent established went so far that the Senate ought to receive the views of the minority. But the gentleman from New York wished to present answers distinctly to the argument of the majority, as he was unwilling to change the form. Now, having the report before him, he replied to it, and gave opinions; perhaps only held by the chairman of the committee, who usually made out the report, taking the leading opinions of the majority, and of course supplying his own. If each member of a committee were to write a report, every report would be different. Then, if the principle were established, that each part of a committee report, each member of a committee ought to have a right to say that his views did not bear that illustration, and to present another report. He wished, if the report were received and printed, to give the majority an opportunity of response.

Ordered to be laid on the table.

The questioning being on printing,

Mr. POINDEXTER said, the gentlemen on the committee made statements and counter statements, both of which might be found on the statute-books of Rhode Island, and the Senate might as well print the statute-books of Rhode Island. He would have no objection against printing the paper, upon an understanding that the speeches were to be left out. The question was, whether the persons sending Mr. ROBBINS were the legislature of Rhode Island. If not, they had no right to elect. The statement was intended to decide who had a right to a seat and who had not.

Mr. CLAYTON objected against printing all accompanying documents.

Mr. WRIGHT said, if the Senator from Georgia was willing, he would modify his motion so as to exclude the printing of the three largest papers, G, H, and I.

Mr. FORSYTH had no objection.

The paper was then ordered to be printed.

The Senate now proceeded to the consideration of the orders of the day; when

The bill authorizing the Governors of the several States to transmit, by mail, certain papers and documents free of postage, was read the third time and passed, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Benton, Bibb, Clayton, Frelinghuysen, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, Kane, Kent, Knight, Linn, McKean, Morris, Poindexter, Porter, Prentiss, Robbins, Robinson, Shepley, Silsbee, Southard, Sprague, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, White, Wilkins.—27.

NAY.—Mr. King, of Georgia.

The bill for the relief of Thomas Fillebrown, jr., was taken up.

Mr. SHEPLEY objected to it on the ground that he would allow compensation for services in no office not established by law.

Mr. SOUTHARD explained, that the compensation for the services in the office of the Secretary of the Navy Board had been again and again inserted in the estimates of the year, had had therefore been sanctioned by Congress; and the claim had also been sanctioned by a decree of the Supreme Court of the United States. He moreover wished to know something of the late Treasury agent.

After further debate, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. CLAYTON submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the following be added to, and form a part of, the rules of the Senate:

"As soon as the Journal is read, the President shall call for petitions from the members of each State, beginning with Maine, and, if in any day the whole of the States shall not be called, the President shall begin on the next day where he left off the previous day."

The Senate adjourned over to Monday.

SALEM (MASS.) MEMORIAL.

Mr. SILSBEE presented a memorial from Salem, in Massachusetts, which he said was upon the all-absorbing subject which had occupied the attention of the Senate for the last three or four months, and was signed by 1,208 of the inhabitants of that town, and accompanied by a certificate of the town clerk of Salem, that of these 1,208 persons who had signed this memorial, 1,115 of them had been ascertained by him to be legal voters, and the remaining 93 were mostly young men who had recently become of age, but who were not taxed the last year; and the respectable delegate who had been charged with the delivery of this memorial here, had informed him that these 1,208 persons were equal to about two-thirds of the legal voters of the town. Mr. S. said, as the opinions and the sentiments of the memorialists upon this subject, are very fully expressed in their memorial, I deem it unnecessary for me to detain the Senate with a repetition of them; but though I leave the memorialists to speak for themselves, I will, according to the present practice of the Senate on similar occasions, say a few words of them. They are my fellow-townsmen, some of whom have been long and honorably known to the whole community, and with many of them I have had a long and intimate acquaintance—such an acquaintance as to warrant a belief, on my part, that this memorial has not been gotten up for the purpose of magnifying existing evils, or increasing existing excitement—such is not the character of these memorialists; they are devoted to their own business, and not in the habit of making complaints of this kind without strong cause—and that they believe such cause now to exist, is sufficiently indicated to me by seeing upon the memorial some names which I think would not otherwise have been placed there. This memorial bears the signatures of men engaged in, I believe, all the learned professions, in commerce, agriculture, manufactures, the mechanic arts, and in most, if not all, branches of industry. Wherever they are known, it will, I think, be admitted that, for sound practical information, for untiring industry, and for persevering enterprise, the people of Salem are behind none of their fellow-citizens. It was the people of that town who opened the way to that extensive and valuable branch of trade which is now pursued from this country to the East Indies, and in which they have participated from that time to the present moment. The first American flag which was unfurled at the Cape of Good Hope was borne there upon a Salem vessel; they were also part owners of the first American vessel that ever doubled Cape Horn; and I doubt if there is a port of trade on the face of the globe, which is known to civilized man, that has not been visited by the ships and the citizens of that ancient town. But the value of those ships and the property of those citizens have been impaired, and the business of the town has been affected by the present deranged state of the currency, which is attributed to the removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States, and to the effect which that measure has had upon public confidence and upon public credit. This state of things, and these impressions as to the cause of it, has led to the adoption of this memorial, which I move may be read and printed, with the names appended to it, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was carried.

TARBOROUGH (N. C.) MEMORIAL.

Mr. BROWN presented the proceedings and resolutions of a public meeting held at Tarborough, North Carolina, approving of the measures of the administration with regard to the Bank of the United States.

The proceedings having been read—

Mr. MANGUM said, it was matter of regret to him, that any portion of his constituents should regard his opposition here to the recent measures of the administration as marked with "captiousness and asperity," and that feeling was increased, by such an opinion being entertained in the old patriotic and republican county of Edgecombe. He was not surprised, however; that county was not more remarkable for its republican principles, than for throwing almost its entire mass in the same direction upon every great question. He had had the pleasure of regarding its citizens heretofore, as being as friendly to him in all his political enterprises, as any in the State, so far from his residence. He entertained a profound respect for their opinions, and received a rebuke from that quarter with all humility. They were old friends, honest in their purposes, and entitled to, as they possessed, his entire respect.

In the great campaign of 1824, when all the political elements throughout the entire South were in active commotion, he had the honor to stand shoulder to shoulder with the citizens of Edgecombe. They, as well as he, were then thoroughly anti-Jackson. They went through that contest with manly firmness, deserving, though they could not command, success. During the succeeding administration, they separated for a moment. He, Mr. M., believed he was in advance of them, in his assaults upon that administration. He soon had the pleasure to find that the people of Edgecombe went gallantly into that contest, and they were again side by side throughout the struggle which terminated in the election of the present Chief Magistrate.

Mr. M. said, he again found himself separated from that county, but he had a strong belief it would turn out now as before—only a temporary separation; that he was only a little in advance, combating the unwarrantable encroachments of Executive power. For in the light of encroachments he was compelled to regard the late Executive measures in reference to the deposits. Time is an essential element in the rectification of error and in the testing of sound opinion. Upon that issue he put his conduct with due humility; but in candor, he was bound to say with undoubting confidence; he might be in error, but upon the developments of time he reated with a full and confiding faith. If those developments shall exhibit the error, he trusted he should not be deficient in a due share of magnanimity to avow the error freely and unqualifiedly. If, on the contrary, the error shall be found on the side of his constituents of Edgecombe, their former history gives assurance of a prompt acknowledgment of it, and an ample reparation.

He was glad to hear their opinions, as he should be to hear the opinions of every county in the State. He should be enlightened by them in his course, and aided in the discharge of his duties. So far as he had heard, or had reason to believe, the opinions of the State were as he had represented them on a former occasion. He believed that a large, a very large majority of the State, was opposed to the late measures of the administration. He might be in error, but time will tell. At all events, judging from information received from every quarter of the State, he could not doubt it. He should be sorry to know, that he had indulged a spirit of "captiousness," or had spoken heretofore with feelings of undue "asperity." He received the rebuke, however, in a spirit of candor, and with no feeling of unkindness. Yet he would believe, that, in the discharge of his duties, he had been deficient in nothing but in the vigor of the arm that aimed the blow at bold and lawless Executive encroachment.

The proceedings were then referred to the Committee on Finance.

RESTRICTION OF EXECUTIVE POWER.

The CHAIR having announced the special order of the day, being the resolutions introduced by Mr. CLAY, on the subject of the restriction of the Executive power, several gentlemen rose to submit motions; when

Mr. CLAY rose and said, that it was proper that the special order, having been announced, should be disposed of; and he was glad to see that when the Chair [Mr. STANLEY was in the Chair] took up the special order, he adhered to it. He said that he had intended to offer some remarks to-day on the resolutions which he had laid before the Senate, but as several members were absent from their seats, for that reason, as well as for other reasons, he should now refrain, and would move that the resolutions be postponed until this day fortnight, and that they be made the special order for that day.

Mr. CALHOUN observed, that the rule of the Senate did not prescribe that the Chair should call the special order at one o'clock to the exclusion of any of the morning business. The rule was specific on this point.

The motion of Mr. CLAY was then agreed to.

Mr. EWING presented a memorial signed by 50 inhabitants of Muskingum county, Ohio, praying the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia.

Mr. EWING said, that although the memorial merited respectful consideration, yet under existing circumstances any legislation on the subject by Congress, at present, and probably for some time to come, he thought would be unwise and inexpedient. On his motion, the memorial was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. PRESTON submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to the Senate the name of the agent or agents employed by him to transact the business of the Treasury with the banks selected for the deposits of the public funds; the nature of the duties performed by said agent or agents; the amount of compensation paid for the discharge of the said duties, and by whom and from what fund the said compensation was paid; and whether the said agent or agents have been appointed in pursuance of law.

Mr. CALHOUN gave notice that he should, on Wednesday next, call up the bill introduced by him to repeal the Force Bill, so called. He had postponed this bill so long, he said, in order to enable the Senate to get through with the debate on the deposit question.

The several resolutions submitted on Friday last, were considered and adopted.

The bill for the relief of Elihu Hall Bey being under consideration, a debate ensued, in which Messrs. WHITE, POINDEXTER, WAGGAMAN, KANE, and BLACK, participated.

Mr. BLACK moved to lay the bill on the table. Lost. Yeas 14, Nays 14.

The debate was resumed by Messrs. FORSYTH, FRELINGHUYSEN, PRESTON, WHITE, and SPRAGUE, when Mr. PORTER renewed the motion to lay the bill upon the table, which prevailed.

The bill appropriating $350,000 for the construction of a lateral branch of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, coming up, on its final passage—

Mr. HENDRICKS said he thought this was a bill containing some provisions which ought to be attended to. The bill appropriated $300,000, or $3,000 a year for twenty years, for carrying the mail. It was a general principle not to charge the Government for the transportation of the mail on common roads, and he thought the principle a proper one in this case. He therefore moved to recommit the bill to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. GRUNDY was in favor of the motion. It was very doubtful whether the principle in the bill, suggested by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HENDRICKS,] ought to be established. He did not think Congress should bind itself to pay a stipulated sum for the performance of a specific duty. It was impossible now to say what, in twenty years, it might be expedient for the Government to do in regard to the transportation of the mail. The proposed arrangement might do very well now, but something might occur, before that time, which might prove that the arrangement was not a desirable one for the public interest. He would rather give the company a much larger sum, and let them carry the mail free of charge as long as the Government chose.

Mr. SPRAGUE observed that the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia was absent, and to recommit the bill to the committee, would seem like an expression of opinion that it ought to be amended; he preferred, therefore, that the bill should be laid on the table; which was agreed to.

The resolution of Mr. POINDEXTER, authorizing the printing of 1,000 copies of the Journals of the old Congress being called up, it was, upon his motion, laid upon the table.

On motion of Mr. FORSYTH, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business, and after spending some time therein, adjourned.

TUESDAY, APRIL 8.

NEW JERSEY MEMORIALS.

Mr. SOUTHARD rose and remarked: I am again under the necessity of troubling the Senate with some additional expressions of public opinion by portions of the people of New Jersey; and I offer for consideration the proceedings of a meeting at Clinton, in the county of Hunterdon, on the 20th March last. I have had some hesitation in presenting them, because they are not original papers, but copies, not signed in the proper handwriting of the presiding officers; nor have I any evidence of the faithfulness of the copy, no certificate being appended to it. They come to me directed simply as a letter, and in a handwriting which I do not recognise as one with which I am acquainted. Under these circumstances, I should decline offering them to the Senate, if they concurred with me in opinion, and disapproved the action of the Executive. But they are of an opposite character. They declare undiminished confidence in the President, and approbation of all that he has done in relation to the public money; denounce the bank as unconstitutional, an overgrown monopoly, aristocratic, and dangerous to the liberties of the country; as having, by itself and its friends, occasioned the existing pressure and distress—approve the conduct of the Secretary of the Treasury, and of the legislature in instructing the Senators and Representatives—and declare their belief that those instructions were in accordance with the sentiments of a majority of the people of the State.

I do not know the numbers who composed the meeting; but with the individuals named as its officers, and members of the committee who are said to have draughted the resolutions, I have a personal acquaintance. They are respectable inhabitants of that part of the county of Hunterdon. And, although I do not agree with them in their expressed opinions of the sentiments of the people of the State, I think it probable, though by no means certain, that the resolutions do express the views of a majority of the voters of that county, and especially of the upper portion of it, where Clinton is situated.

I also offer the proceedings of another public meeting, held at the same place, on the same day, by those who entertain entirely different opinions, much more nearly allied to my own views. The persons mentioned in these proceedings are also known to me as not less respectable than the others. The presiding officer has been a member of the Jackson party, and was elected, by them, Speaker of the legislative assembly of the State. The person offering the resolutions was also of that party, and is, I believe, favorably known to some of the members of the Senate; and they assert that persons of all parties united unanimously in their memorial and resolutions.

These memorialists are of all classes of society in that county, and they declare that they are laboring under deep pecuniary distress; that their produce, in the short space of a few months, has depreciated at least from 25 to 30 per cent.; that confidence is gone; that men, regarded but a short time since as responsible, are now looked upon with suspicion; that no one is willing to hold bank paper; that they take it to the banks, draw out the specie, and hoard it up; and, unless something be speedily done, business must stop.

Mr. President, are not these statements true—true to the letter—proved by the severe affliction of the whole community? Does any man now venture to deny this truth? It was for some time denied by the partisans of the Executive in the country, and they who asserted it were denounced as false and unjust railers against the great and good man who holds the chief Executive power, and the very wise and virtuous men who direct his councils. It was said to be an idle fancy—a momentary effect of delusion—a party trick—and would pass by, as other accusations have passed by; and such, we hear, is, to this hour, the firm belief of the President himself. But is it so? Do not even zealous partisans now admit the truth? Do not the whole people, every where, feel deep distress? And are they not agitated by fears of more and greater coming distress? We have arrived, then, at one point in this controversy—a point on which necessity compels the advocates of the Executive to admit their error. For this suffering, a reason must be found. Whatever and whoever is the guilty cause, has an awful responsibility to the present and the future—a responsibility which the mere claims of party discipline, and the support of party men, never can meet and answer.

These memorialists attribute the unnatural state of things which exists, principally to the removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States, and to the illegal and rash measures, "the empirical experiment" of the Executive upon the currency of the country.

The resolutions embrace the same views as the memorial, and also express their opinions on the nature of the right of instruction, and declare the instructions to my colleague and myself to be contrary to the will of the majority of the people of the State. Upon this right, it is not my purpose to say any thing at this time. It may be required of me, on some other occasion, to exhibit the gross, and, in some instances, I fear, wilful misrepresentations to which my opinions have been subjected.

I offer, also, the proceedings of another public meeting, held at Lawrence, in the same county of Hunterdon, assembled without distinction of party, and composed of intelligent and respectable individuals, who express the same opinions as are contained in the preceding memorial and resolutions. These people, sir, consider the question before them as rising above mere considerations of party—as one of violated rights—broken laws—outraged constitution, and of general suffering unnecessarily produced by the hand of power; and they find it difficult to perceive why they shall suffer, from day to day, merely that the Executive may carry out an experiment, or gratify feelings of personal resentment.

The fourth memorial and proceedings are from the county of Cape May, which is on the southern point of New Jersey; neither large in extent of territory nor in population; represented by one member in each branch of the legislature. The vote in this county, at the last Presidential election, was 486 for the unsuccessful candidate, and 237 for the successful one. The number of signatures to the memorial is 628, within 25 of the whole number of votes at the last Presidential election, and nearly three times the number which the electors for Gen. Jackson then received. They state themselves to be inhabitants and legal voters of the county; and the secretary of the meeting assures me, that at least three-fourths of the legal voters of the county have signed the memorial, in the very short time in which it was offered for signature, being only, I believe, about one week.

A meeting, upon public notice, was held at the courthouse on the 22d of March, for the purpose of taking into consideration the situation of public affairs. It is stated that, "among those who took an active part in the proceedings, and voted for the resolutions, were many who have been warm supporters of General Jackson, but who are unwilling to sanction acts in him which their judgment and consciences condemn."

These resolutions, thus passed, and the accompanying memorial, are strong and decisive in their character. They represent great stagnation, difficulty, and embarrassment, in their usual business; and, we may be assured, it was no party excitement, which actuated that intelligent, but quiet and unassuming people, to send their complaints to Congress. The soil of the country is not as rich, nor the agricultural productions as abundant, as in some other parts of the State; yet there is, perhaps, no part of it where there is more of comfort and independence. They are extensively engaged in the coasting trade, and in furnishing lumber and fuel for the cities of New York and Philadelphia. More, perhaps, than one hundred vessels belonging to the county, are engaged in that business. The prices of their lumber are depressed at least 25 per cent., which takes away their whole profits. Ready sales are not made, even at this reduction. Their freights between the cities of New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and the South, are reduced in like proportion. They cannot find employment that will pay the expenses of outfits, hands, wages, &c., and in many instances their vessels lie altogether inactive—going to decay much more rapidly than when under the daily care of their crews. They feel this state of things with great severity, and they attribute it to its true cause—the removal of the public money from the depository prepared and sanctioned, and, as they had hoped, protected by law; and to the interference of the Executive with the currency of the country; and they ask for a restoration and for a recharter of the bank, with such other speedy relief as, in the wisdom of Congress, may be suited to the sufferings and necessities of the country.

They are not, it seems, satisfied with the ingenious contrivance of those advocates of Executive assumption, who justify violations of law, in the President and Secretary of the Treasury, by the extraordinary argument that the bank has also violated law; and that, inasmuch as the bank is guilty, therefore the President has a right to do what he has done; that, because the bank has acted improperly, therefore it may be punished without law or trial; because the allegation is made that it has used a part of the money intrusted to it improperly, therefore the Executive may take all the public money away, of his own mere motion, to gratify his own resentments, and without the permission of the constitutional guardians of the public Treasury. This is a species of reasoning not ill suited to the legal and moral principles of the voters of Cape May. They do not comprehend that species of logic which, after a conflict has begun, casts suspicion on him who struck the first blow, but on those who resisted the assault. They cannot see the conclusion from the premises, and have an old-fashioned notion that, as the state of the country was prosperous when the President chose to attack the bank, and as it has done nothing more than to protect itself, he must answer for the result of the conflict. He who strikes the first blow is guilty of the assault, and they therefore trace "the commencement of that wide-spread distress and desolation, which now pervades the country," to the Executive alone.

They do not stop, Mr. President, in their resolution at this one act of Executive assumption, but recite the others of the same character, as indicative of that mischievous in which they perceive "with deep mortification and regret, a determined and onward course of concentration of all power in the Executive arm—a reckless and unfeeling disposition towards the sufferings and complaints of the people, totally unbecoming the Chief Magistrate of an enlightened, intelligent, and free nation—a course of conduct that would scarcely be tolerated in the ruler of a despotic government, and which approximates too closely to those tyrannical and oppressive assumptions of power which excited the complaints and resistance" of their revolutionary fathers.

They express a decided and unequivocal disapprobation of the legislative instructions to their Senators and Representatives—view them "as a libel upon the intelligence, and a gross and unwarrantable misrepresentation of the sentiments of the people"—and declare that they have the strongest indications from all parts of the State and every rational cause to believe, that their own resolutions speak the opinions of a large majority of the voters of New Jersey; and that their Senators and Representatives ought to pay no regard to the unauthorized instructions of the legislature.

The opinions they express are in conformity with their own convictions of the wishes of the majority of the people. There have been already presented from Burlington, Cumberland, Gloucester, and Cape May, also, majorities sufficient largely to overbalance the whole majority by which the last Presidential electors, and the present members of the House of Representatives, were elected.

And I beg now to add a memorial from Salem county, also in the western part of the State, and the only one from which I have not already presented memorials. It is in some respects differently situated from the county of Cape May, as to its employments and interests; but its inhabitants speak an equally strong language, both in reward to the cause of their sufferings and the remedy for them, and their opinions of the instructions of the legislature. I am authorized and requested by the committee who transmitted the memorial, to state, that it contains the signatures of 1,004 persons, who are, they sincerely believe, citizens of the county—of full age—and, or the most part, individually known to the committee. That it expresses the sentiments of men of both political parties, and in every station of life. That there were several memorials in the remote parts of the county which had not been returned, and which would swell the aggregate amount of names to upwards of 1,200—and, had due exertion been used by the several committees in the different townships, they were confident that the signatures of two-thirds of the legal voters of the county could have been obtained. At the last Presidential election, the Jackson party had 936 votes in this county. The instructing members of the legislature held their seats by 741 votes. And there is no escape from the result of this statement, by supposing that the party in the county were taken by surprise. When the notice was given for a public meeting, without distinction of party, to take into consideration the present deranged state of the currency, and express their sentiments as to the course pursued by the Secretary of the Treasury, the faithful were warned of their duty. Handbills in abundance were circulated to guard them against a violation of their allegiance—requesting them not to sign the memorial. Yet, sir, the memorial bears the signatures of 1,004 inhabitants of that county. There were some found who would not regard the request. They loved their country and her laws better than party bonds—Rome rather than Cæsar—and chose to follow the dictates of their own judgments. Sir, there will be found many more such hereafter.

I have now presented to the Senate memorials from all the counties in West Jersey below Trenton, and feel at liberty to assure the Senate, that the whole of these counties are of one mind on this agitating question, and that they were not faithfully represented in the instructions. My colleague and myself cannot obey these instructions, without direct and wilful disobedience of the wishes and opinions of our constituents, by whose choice we hold our seats. And this disobedience would be a violation of our own consciences, and a faithless disregard of our obligations to our country, and her constitution and laws.

I do not hesitate to declare my firm belief that our constituents concur with us. While they are compelled to suffer unmerited calamity, they will demand to know who has the right, in this land of law, to inflict it upon them. After they have, by the most solemn instruments, intrusted the keeping of their money to their own chosen agents, with safeguards of their own forming, they will not consent that it shall be forcibly taken from them, and confided, without proper security, to agents not of their choice, but selected by others. When they have a currency competent to meet all their interests and their wants, they will not pardon the mad experiments of unlicensed authority, to derange and destroy it. After having established a constitution and government, and laws, by immense expenditures and sacrifices, they will not permit any man to violate them with impunity. They do disapprove strongly, decidedly, and firmly, of the wild course of Executive usurpation. They will stand, as they have heretofore stood, by the constitution and laws; their protection, and their pride—and will not, without resistance, see them recklessly trampled under foot. Personal devotion to a man, whoever he may be—support of a party, whatever are its claims, will be to them no compensation. The man must soon pass by—the party may be dissolved and perish—but with the destruction of the constitution and laws, will sink forever their hopes of liberty and happiness for themselves, and of free institutions for their fellow-men. They feel that, of them it may be said with present truth, and prophetic certainty,

"While stands the Coliseum, Rome shall stand;
"When falls the Coliseum, Rome shall fall;
"And when Rome falls—the world."

And we be to that hand which shall tear away any portion of their materials to erect any other edifice, whether of personal or party power.

Mr. S. then moved the reading, printing, and usual reference of all these memorials and proceedings; which motion was agreed to.

Mr. WHITE now rose and moved (the morning business being disposed of) that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Executive business.

Mr. CLAY hoped not. He thought there was nothing so urgent before the Senate as to make it necessary to omit going on with the business on the table.

Mr. WHITE said it was with great reluctance he would press the motion to the prejudice of the business of any gentleman. But situated as some of the Executive business was, he thought he could not postpone it. Some of it required to be acted on; and on looking to the ordinary business for to-morrow, he feared, if he did not press the motion now, he might not have an opportunity of doing so for some days. The Senate knew what that business was, and if they believed there was any other business which ought to be preferred, he would acquiesce.

The motion was agreed to, on a division, 19 to 15.

When the doors were opened,

Mr. CLAYTON moved the consideration of the resolution providing a new rule of the Senate in reference to the presentation of petitions and reports, when called for, in the order of the States.

Mr. CLAYTON urged the resolution, to save the consumption of time and confusion resulting from several members rising at the same time.

Mr. CLAY, Mr. CALHOUN, Mr. KING of Alabama, and Mr. SPRAGUE, objected to the rule, as subjecting the President of the Senate to the tedious form of calling over all the States, which would cause as much delay as arose from the present mode of transacting the business of the Senate.

Mr. CALHOUN moved to lay the resolution on the table; which was disagreed to, yeas 17, nays 19.

Mr. CLAY moved an amendment, that after the reading of the Journal, the President should call for petitions and then for reports.

Mr. KING, of Georgia, expressed a hope that the elder members of the Senate would withdraw their opposition to the resolution, as it seemed to come principally from them, which he thought was to be attributed to the superior skill and tact which they had acquired by long experience.

Mr. EWING then moved an adjournment, with a view of having a more full attendance of the Senate, in considering the resolution. The motion was agreed to, 21 to 17.

The Senate then adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 9.

After going through the usual morning business, the CHAIR announced the general orders of the day.

REPEAL OF THE FORCE ACT.

Mr. CALHOUN moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill, which had been, on his motion, laid on the table.

The motion having been agreed to, and the bill having been read,

Mr. CALHOUN rose and addressed the Senate as follows:

I have, said Mr. C. introduced this bill from a deep conviction, that the act which it proposes to repeal is, in its tendency, subversive of our political institutions, and fatal to the liberty and happiness of the country; which I trust to be able to establish to the satisfaction of the Senate, should I be so fortunate as to obtain a dispassionate and favorable hearing.

SENATE.]

Repeal of the Force Act.

In resting the repeal on this ground, it is not my intention to avail myself of the objections to the details of the act, as repugnant as many of them are to the principles of our Government. In illustration of the truth of this assertion, I might select that provision which vests in the President, in certain cases, of which he is made the judge, the entire force of the country, civil, military, and naval, with the implied power of pledging the public faith for whatever expenditure he may choose to incur in its application. And to prove how dangerous it is to vest such extraordinary powers in the Executive, I might avail myself of the experience which we have had in the last few months of the aspiring character of that department of the Government, and which has furnished conclusive evidence of the danger of vesting in it even a very limited discretion. It is not for me to judge of the propriety of the course which the members of this body may think proper to pursue, in reference to the question under consideration; but I must say, that I am at loss to understand how any one who regards, as I do, the acts to which I have referred, as palpable usurpations of power, and as indicating, on the part of the Executive, a dangerous spirit of aggrandizement, can vote against the bill under consideration, and thereby virtually vote to continue in the President the extraordinary and dangerous power in question.

But, it may be said, that the provision of the act which confers this power will expire, by its own limitation, at the termination of the present session. It is true, it will then cease to be a law; but it is no less true, that the precedent, unless the act be expunged from the statute book, will live forever, ready, on any pretext of future danger, to be quoted as an authority to confer on the Chief Magistrate similar, or even more dangerous powers, if more dangerous can be devised. We live in an eventful period, and, among other things, we have had, recently, some impressive lessons on the danger of precedents. To them immediately we owe the act which has caused the present calamitous and dangerous condition of the country; which has been defended almost solely, on the ground of precedents—precedents, almost unnoticed at the time; but, had they not existed, or had they been reversed at the time by Congress, our condition would have been very different from what it now is. With the knowledge of these facts, we must see that a bad precedent is as dangerous as the bad measure itself, and, in some respects, more so, as it may give rise to acts worse than itself, as in the case to which I have alluded. In this view of the subject, to refuse to vote against the repeal of the act and thereby constitute a precedent to confer similar, or more dangerous powers hereafter, would be as dangerous as to vote for an act to vest permanently in the President the power in question.

But I pass over this, and other objections to the details, not much less formidable—I take a higher stand against the act—I object to the principle in which it originated—putting the details aside—on the ground, as I have stated, that they are subversive of our political institutions, and fatal in their tendency to the liberty and happiness of the country. Fortunately, we are not left to conjecture, or inference, as to what these principles are. It was openly proclaimed, both here and elsewhere, in the debates of this body, and the proclamation and message of the President, in which the act originated, that the very basis on which it rests—the assumption on which only it could be supported, was, that this Government had the final and conclusive right, in the last resort, to judge of the extent of its powers; and that to execute its decision, it had the right to use all the means of the country, civil, military, and fiscal; not only against individuals, or against the Governments of the States, but against the States themselves, and all acting under their authority, whether in a legislative, executive, or judicial capacity.

If further evidence be required as to the nature and character of the act, it will be found in the history of the events in which it took its origin. It originated, as we all know, in a controversy between this Government and the State of South Carolina, in reference to a power which involves the question of the constitutionality of a protective tariff. I do not intend to give the history of this controversy; it is sufficient for my purpose to say, that the State, in maintenance of what she believed to be her unquestionable power, assumed the highest ground; she placed herself on her sovereign authority as a constituent member of this confederacy, and made her opposition to the encroachment on her rights through a convention of the people, the only organ which, according to our conception, the sovereign will of a State can be immediately and directly pronounced. This Government, on its part, in reference to the action of the State, assumed the right to trample upon the authority of the convention, and to look beyond the State to the individuals who composed it, not as forming a political community, but as a mere mass of insulated individuals, without political character or authority; and thus asserted, in the strongest manner, not only the right of judging of its own powers, but that of overlooking, in a contest for power, the very existence of the State itself, and of recognising, in the assertion of what it might claim to be its power, no other authority whatever in the system but its own.

Such being the principle in which this bill originated, we are brought to the consideration of a question of the deepest import. Is an act, which assumes such powers for this Government, consistent with the nature and character of our political institutions?

It is not my intention, in the discussion of this question, to renew the debate of the last session. But, in declining to renew that discussion, I wish to be distinctly understood, that I do so exclusively on the ground, that I do not feel myself justified in repeating arguments so recently advanced; and not on the ground, that there is at least abatement of confidence in the positions then assumed, or in the decisive bearing which they ought to have against the act. So far otherwise, time and reflection have but served to confirm me in the impression which I then entertained; and, without repeating the arguments, I now avail myself in this discussion of the positions then established, and stand prepared to vindicate them against whatever assaults may be made upon them, come from what quarter they may. Without, then, reopening the discussion of the last session, on the elementary principles of our Government, which were brought into controversy, I shall now proceed to take the plainest and most common-sense view of our political institutions, regarding them merely in a matter of fact point of view, in order to ascertain the parts and the relations which they bear to each other.

Thus regarding our institutions, we are struck, on the first view, with the number and complexity of the parts, with the division, classification, and organization which pervades every part of the system. It is, in fact, a system of governments; and these, in turn, are a system of departments—a system in which government bears the same relation to government, in reference to the whole, as departments do to departments, in reference to each particular government. As each government is made up of the legislative, executive, and judicial departments organized into one, so the system is made up of this

Repeal of the Force Act.

[SENATE.]

ernment and the State governments in like manner organized into one system. So, too, as the powers which constitute the respective governments are divided and organized into departments, in like manner, in the formation of the governments, their powers are classed into two distinct divisions; the one containing powers local and peculiar in their character, which the interests of the States require to be exercised by each State, through a separate government; the other containing those which are more general and comprehensive, and which can be best exercised, in some uniform mode, through a common government. The former of these divisions constitute what, in our system, are known as the reserved powers, and are exercised by each State through its own separate government. The latter are known as the delegated powers, and are exercised through this, the common government of the several States. This division of power into two parts, with distinct and independent governments, regularly organized into departments, legislative, executive, and judicial, to carry their respective parts into effect, constitutes the great, striking, and peculiar character of our system, and is without example in ancient or modern times; and may be regarded as the fundamental distribution of power under the system, and as constituting its great conservative principle.

If we extend our eyes beyond, we shall find another striking division, between the power of the people and that of the government—between that inherent, primitive, creative power, which resides exclusively in the people, and from which all authority is derived, and the delegated power or trust, conferred upon the government, to effect the object of their creation. If we look still beyond, we shall find another and most important division. The people, instead of being united in one general community, are divided into twenty-four States, each forming distinct sovereign communities; and in which, separately, the whole power of the system ultimately resides.

If we examine how this ultimate power is called into action, we shall find that its only organ is a primary assemblage of the people, known under the name of a convention, through which their sovereign will is announced, and by which governments are formed and organized. If we trace historically the exertion of this power, in the formation of the governments constituting our system, we shall find that originally, on the separation of the thirteen colonies from the crown of Great Britain, each State of itself, through its own conventions, formed separate constitutions and governments, and that these governments, in turn, formed a league or confederacy for the purpose of exercising those powers in the regulation of which the States had a common interest. But this confederacy, proving incompetent for its object, was superseded by the present constitution, which totally changed the character of the system. If we compare the mode of the adoption of this constitution with that of the adoption of the original constitutions of the several States, we shall find them precisely the same. In both, each State adopted the constitution through its own convention, by its separate act, for itself, and was only bound in consequence of its own adoption, without reference to the adoption of any other State. The only point in which they can be distinguished, is the mutual compact in which each stipulated with the other to adopt it as a common constitution. Thus regarded, this constitution is, in fact, the constitution of each State. In Virginia, for instance, it is the constitution of Virginia; and so, too, this government, and the laws which it enacts, are, within the limits of the State, the government and the laws of the State. It is, in fact, the constitution and government of the whole, because it is the constitution and government of each part, and not the constitution and government of the parts, because it is of the whole. The system commences with the parts, and ends with the whole. The parts are the units, and the whole the multiple, instead of the whole being a unit and the parts the fractions. Thus viewed, each State has two distinct constitutions and governments—a separate constitution and government, instituted, as I have stated, to regulate the object in which each has a peculiar interest, and a general one to regulate the interests common to all, and binding, by a common compact, the whole into one community, in which the separate and independent existence of each State, as a sovereign community, is preserved, instead of being fused into a common mass.

Such is our system, such are its parts, and such their relation to each other. I have stated no fact that can be questioned, nor have I omitted any which I am capable of perceiving. In reviewing the whole, we must be no less struck with the simplicity of the means by which all are blended into one, than we are by the number and complexity of the parts. I know of no system, in either respect, ancient or modern, to be compared with it; and can compare it to nothing but that sublime and beautiful system of which our globe constitutes a part, and to which it bears, in many particulars, so striking a resemblance. In this system, this Government, as we have seen, constitutes a part—a prominent, but a subordinate part—with defined, limited, and restricted powers.

I now repeat the question, Is the act which assumes for the government the right to interpret, in the last resort, the extent of its powers, and to enforce its interpretation against all other authority, consistent with our institutions? To state the question is to answer it. We might, with equal propriety, ask whether a government of unlimited power is consistent with one of enumerated and restricted power. I say unlimited, for I would hold his understanding in low estimation who can make, practically, any distinction between a government of unlimited powers and one which has an unlimited right to construe and enforce its power as it pleases, or who does not see that, to divide power, and to give one of the parties the exclusive right to determine what share belongs to him, is to annihilate the division, and to vest the whole in him who possesses the right. It would be no less absurd than for one in private life to divide his property with another, and vest in that other the absolute and unconditional right to determine the extent of his share, which would be, in fact, to give him the whole. Nor could I think much more highly of the understanding of him who does not perceive that this exclusive right, on the part of this Government, of determining the extent of its powers, necessarily destroys all distinction between reserved and delegated powers, and that it thus strikes a fatal blow at that fundamental distribution of power which lies at the bottom of our system. It, also, by inevitable consequence, destroys all distinction between constitutional and unconstitutional laws, making the latter to the full as obligatory as the former, of which we had a remarkable example when the act proposed to be repealed was before the Senate.

It is well known that the power in controversy between this Government and the State of South Carolina, had been pronounced to be unconstitutional by the legislatures of most of the Southern States, and also by many of the members of this body, and yet there were instances, however extraordinary it may appear, of members of the body voting to enforce an act which they believed to be unconstitutional, and that too at the hazard of civil war. As strange as such a course must appear, it was the natural and legitimate consequence of the power which the act assumed for this Government, and illustrates, in the strongest manner imaginable, the truth of what I have advanced. But to proceed. This unlimited right of judging as to its powers, not only destroys, as I have stated, all distinction between constitutional and unconstitutional acts, but merges in this Government the very existence of the separate Governments of the States, by reducing them from that independent and distinct existence, as co-Governments assigned to them in the system, to mere subordinate and dependent bodies, holding their power and existence at the mercy of this Government. It stops not here; it annihilates the States themselves. The right which it assumes of trampling upon the authority of a convention of the people of the States, the only organ through which the sovereignty of the States can exert itself, and to look beyond the States to the individuals who compose them, and to treat them as entirely destitute of all political character or power, is, in fact, to annihilate the States, and to transfer their sovereignty, and all their powers, to this Government.

If we now raise our eyes, and direct them towards that once beautiful system, with all its various, separate, and independent parts blended into one harmonious whole, we must be struck with the mighty change. All have disappeared, gone; absorbed, concentrated, and consolidated in this Government, which is left alone, in the midst of the desolation of the system, the sole and unrestricted representative of an absolute and despotic majority.

Will it be tolerated, that I should ask whether an act, which has caused so complete a revolution, which has entirely subverted your political system, as it emanated from the hands of its creators, and reared in its place one in every respect so different, must not, in its consequences, prove fatal to the liberty and the happiness of these States? Can it be necessary for me to prove that no other system that human ingenuity can devise, or imagination conceive, but that which this fatal act has subverted, can preserve the liberty or secure the happiness of the country? Need I show that the most difficult problem which ever was presented to the mind of a legislator to solve, was to devise a system of government for a country of such vast extent, that should at once possess sufficient power to hold the whole together, without, at the same time, proving fatal to liberty? There never existed an example before, of a free community spreading over such an extent of territory; and the ablest and profoundest thinkers, at the time, believed it to be utterly impracticable that there should be. Yet this difficult problem was solved, successfully solved, by the wise and sagacious men who framed our constitution. No, it was above unaided human wisdom—above the sagacity of the most enlightened. It was the result of a fortunate combination of circumstances, co-operating and leading the way to its formation, directed by that kind Providence which has so often and so signally disposed events in our favor.

To solve this difficult problem, and to overcome the apparently insuperable obstacle which it presents, required that remarkable division, distribution, and organization of power, which, as I have stated, so remarkably distinguish our system, and which serve as so many breakwaters to arrest the angry waves of power, impelled by avarice and ambition; and which, driven furiously over a broad and unbroken expanse, would be resistless. Of this partition and breaking up of power into separate parts, the most remarkable division is that between the reserved and delegated powers, which forms the basis on which this and the separate governments of the States are organized, as the great and primary departments of the system. It is this important division which mainly gives that expansive character to our institutions, by means of which they have the capacity of being spread over the vast extent of our country, without exposing us on the one side to the danger of disunion, or, on the other, to the loss of liberty. Without this happy device, the people of these States, after having achieved their independence, would have been compelled to resolve themselves into small and hostile communities, in despite of a common origin, a common language, and the common renown and glory acquired by their united wisdom and valor in the war of the revolution, or have submitted quietly to the yoke of despotic power, as the only alternative.

In the place of this admirably contrived system, the act proposed to be repealed has erected one great consolidated government. Can it be necessary for me to show what must be the inevitable consequences? Need I prove that all consolidated governments—governments in which a single power predominates, (for such is their essence,) are necessarily despotic, whether that power be wielded by the will of one man, or that of an absolute and unchecked majority? Need I demonstrate that it is, on the contrary, the very essence of liberty, that the power should be so divided, distributed, and organized, that one interest may check the other, so as to prevent the excessive action of the separate interests of the community against each other, on the principle, that organized power can only be checked by organized power?

The truth of these doctrines was fully understood at the time of the formation of this constitution. It was then clearly foreseen and foretold, what must be the inevitable consequences of concentrating all the powers of the system in this Government. Yes, we are in a state predicted, foretold, prophesied from the beginning. All the calamities we have experienced, and those which are yet to come, are the result of the consolidating tendency of the Government; and, unless that tendency be arrested—unless we reverse our steps, all that have been foretold will certainly befall us; even to the pouring out of the last vial of wrath—military despotism. To this fruitful source of woes may be traced that remarkable decay of public virtue; that rapid growth of corruption and subserviency; that decline of patriotism; that increase of faction; that tendency to anarchy; and, finally, that visible approach of the absolute power of one man, which so lamentably characterize the times. Should there be any one, seeing and acknowledging all these morbid and dangerous symptoms, but should doubt whether the disease is to be traced to the cause which I have assigned, I would ask him, to what other can it be attributed? There is no event—no, not in the political or moral world more than in the physical—without an adequate cause. I would ask him, does he attribute it to the people? To their want of sufficient intelligence and virtue for self-government? If the true cause may be traced to them, very melancholy would be our situation, gloomy would be the prospect before us. If such be the fact, that our people are indeed incapable of self-government, I know of no people upon earth with whom we might not desire to change condition. When the day comes when this people shall be compelled to surrender self-government—a people so spirited, and so long accustomed to liberty, it will be indeed a day of revolution, of convulsion, and blood, such as has rarely, if ever, been witnessed in any age or country; and, until compelled by irresistible evidence, so fearful a cause cannot be admitted.

Can it be attributed to the nature of our system of government? Shall we pronounce it radically defective, and incapable of effecting the objects for which it was created? If that be in truth the case, our situation would be, in fact, not much less calamitous than if attributable to the people. To what other system could we resort? To a confederation? That has already been tried, and has proved utterly inadequate. To consolidation? Reason and experience (as far as we have had experience) proclaims it to be the worst possible form. But, if the cause be not in the people or the system, to what can it be attributed, but to some misapprehension of the nature and character of our institutions, and consequent misdirection of their powers or functions? And, if so, to what other misapprehension, or misdirection, but that which directed our system towards consolidation, and consummated its movement in that direction in the act proposed to be repealed? That such is the fact—that this is the true explanation of all the symptoms of decay and corruption which I have enumerated, is in reality our only consolation—furnishes the only hope that can be rationally entertained of extricating ourselves from our present calamity, and of averting the still greater that are impending.

I know that there are those who take a different, but in my opinion a very superficial, view of the cause of our difficulties. They attribute it exclusively to those who are in power, and see, in the misconduct of General Jackson, the cause of all that has befallen us. That he has done much to aggravate the evil, I acknowledge with pain. I had my full share of responsibility in elevating him to power, and there once existed between us friendly relations, personal and political; and I would rejoice had he so continued to conduct himself as to advance the interests of the country, and his own reputation and fame. He certainly might have effected much good. He came into office under circumstances, and had a weight of popularity, which placed much in his power, for good or for evil; but either from a want of a just comprehension of the duties attached to the situation in which he was placed, or an indisposition to discharge them, or the improper influence and control of those who, unfortunately for the country and for himself, have acquired, through flattery and subserviency, an ascendancy over him, he has disappointed the hopes of his friends, and realized the predictions of his enemies. But the question recurs, how happened it, that he who has proved himself so ill qualified to fill the high station that he occupies, was elected by the people? If it be attributed to a misapprehension of his qualifications, or to an undue gratitude for distinguished military services, which at times leads astray the most intelligent and virtuous people in the selection of rulers, now shall we explain his re-election, after he had actually proved himself so incompetent—after he had violated every pledge which he had made previous to election—after he had disregarded the principles on which he had permitted his friends and partisans to place his elevation, and had outraged the feelings of the community, by attempting to regulate the domestic intercourse and relations of society? Shall we say, that the feelings of gratitude for military services outweighed all this? or that the people, with all this experience, were incapable of forming a correct opinion of his conduct or character, or of understanding the tendency of the measures of his administration? To assert this, would be neither more nor less than to assert that they have neither the intelligence nor the virtue for self-government: as the very criterion by which their capacity in that respect is tested, is their ability duly to appreciate the character and conduct of public rulers, and the true tendency of their public measures; and to admit their incapacity in that respect would, in fact, bring us back to the people as the cause.

To understand truly how the distinguished individual, now at the head of the nation, was elevated to this exalted station, in spite of his acknowledged defects in several respects, and how he has retained his power among an intelligent and patriotic people, notwithstanding all the objections to his administration that have been stated, we must elevate our views from the individual and his qualifications and conduct, to the working of the system itself; by which only we can come to a knowledge of the true cause of our present condition, how we have arrived at it, and by what means we can extricate ourselves from its dangers and difficulties. I do not deem it necessary, in making this view, to go back and trace the operation of our government from the commencement, or to point out the departure from its true principles from the beginning, with the evils thence resulting, however interesting and instructive the investigation might be. I might show that, from the first, beginning with the formation of the constitution, there were two parties in the convention; one in favor of a national, or what is the same thing, a consolidated government; and the other, in favor of the confederative principle; how the latter, from being in the minority at first, gradually, and after a long struggle, gained the ascendancy; and how the fortunate result of that ascendancy terminated in the establishment of that beautiful, complex, federative system of government, which I have attempted to explain.

I might show that the struggle between the two parties did not terminate with the adoption of the constitution; that, after it went into operation, the national party gained the ascendancy in the councils of the nation, and that the result of that ascendancy was to give an impulse to the Government, in the direction which their principles led, and from which it never afterwards recovered. I am far from attributing this to any sinister design. The party were not less distinguished for patriotism than for ability, and no doubt honestly intended to give the system a fair trial; but they would have been more than men, if their attachment to their favorite plan had not biased their feelings and judgment. I (said Mr. C.) avail myself of the occasion to avow my high respect for both of the great parties which divided the country in its early history. They were both eminently honest and patriotic, and the preference which each gave to its respective views, resulted from a zealous attachment to the public interest. At that early period, before there was any experience as to the operation of the system, it is not surprising that one should believe that the danger was a tendency to anarchy, while the other believed it to be towards despotism; and that these different theoretical views should honestly have a decided influence on their public conduct.

I pass over the intermediate events; the reaction against the national, or, as it was then called, federal party—the elevation of Mr. Jefferson in consequence of that reaction, in 1801—and the gradual departure (from the influence of power) of the republican party, from the principles which brought them into office—I come down at once to the year 1824—when a protective tariff was for the first time adopted; when the power to impose duties, granted for the purpose of raising revenue, was converted into an instrument for regulating, controlling, and organizing the entire capital and industry of the country, and placing them under the influence of this Government—and when the principles of consolidation gained an entire ascendancy in both Houses of Congress. Its first fruit was to give a sectional action to the Government, and of course a sectional character to political parties—arraying the non-exporting States against the exporting, and the Northern against the Southern section.

It is my wish to speak of the events to which I feel myself compelled to refer, in illustration of the practical operation of that consolidating tendency of the Government, which was consummated by the act proposed to be repealed, and which I believe to be the cause of all our evils, with the greatest possible moderation. I know how delicate a task it is to speak of recent political events, and of the actors concerned in them; and I would on this occasion gladly avoid so painful a duty, if I did not believe that truth and the public interest require it. Without a full understanding of the events of this period, from 1824 down to the present time, it is impossible that we can have a just knowledge of the cause of our present condition, or a clear perception of the means of remedying it. To avoid all personal feeling, I shall endeavor to recede, in imagination, a century from the present time, and from that distant position regard the events to which I allude, in that spirit of philosophical inquiry which an earnest seeker after truth, at so remote a day, may be supposed to be actuated. I feel I may be justified in speaking with the less reserve of these events, as the great question which, during the greater part of the period, so deeply agitated the country, (the protective tariff,) may now be considered as terminated in the adjustment of the last winter, never to be reagitated, as I trust; and of course, may be spoken of with the freedom of a past event.

But to proceed with the narrative—the Presidential contest, which was terminated the next year, placed the executive department in the possession of the same interest that controlled the legislative, so that all departments of this Government were united in favor of that great interest. The successful termination of the election in favor of the individual then elevated to the chief magistracy, and for whom I then and now entertained kind feelings, may be attributed, in part, no doubt, to the predominance of the tariff interest; and may be considered as the first instance of the predominance of that interest in a Presidential contest.

Let us pause at this point, (it is an important one,) in order to survey the state of public affairs at that juncture. In casting our eyes over the scene, we find the country divided into two great hostile and sectional parties; placed in conflict on a question believed to be on both sides of vital importance, in reference to their respective interests—and on the side of the weaker party, believed, in addition, to involve a constitutional question of the greatest magnitude, and having a direct and important bearing on the duration of the liberty and constitution of the country. In this conflict, we find both Houses of Congress with the Chief Magistrate, and of course the Government itself, on the side of the dominant interest, and identified with it, in principles and feelings. In this state of things, a great and solemn question, what ought to be done? was forced on the decision of the minority. Shall we acquiesce? or shall we oppose? and, if oppose, how? To acquiesce quietly would be to subject the property and industry of an entire section of the country to an unlimited and indefinite exaction; as it was openly avowed, that the protective system could only be perfected by being carried to the point of prohibition on all articles of which a sufficient supply could be made or manufactured in the country. To submit, under such circumstances, would have been, according to our view of the subject, a gross dereliction both of interest and duty. It was impossible. But how could the majority be successfully opposed, possessed as they were of every department of the Government? How, in this state of things, could the minority effect a change in their favor, through the ordinary operations of the Government? They could effect no favorable change in this, or the other House—the majority, in both, but too faithfully represented what their constituents believed to be the interest of their section, to whom only, and not to us, they were responsible. The only branch of the Government, then, on which the minority could act, and through which they could hope to effect a favorable change, was the Executive. The President is elected by a majority of the whole electoral votes, and, of course, the minority has a weight in his election, in proportion to their number, and the unity of their voice. Here was all our hope, and to this point all our efforts to effect a change were necessarily directed; but even here our power of acting with effect was limited to a narrow circle. It would have been hopeless to present a candidate openly and fully identified with our own interest. Defeat would have been the certain result, had his acknowledged qualifications for intelligence, experience, and patriotism been ever so great. We were thus forced, by inevitable consequence—a consequence neither to be avoided or resisted—to abandon the contest, or to select a candidate who, at best, was but a choice of evils—one whose opinions were intermediate or doubtful, on the subject which divided the two sections. However great the hazard, or the objections to such a selection, for such an office, it must be charged, not to us, but to that action of the system, which compelled us to make the choice—compelling us by that consolidating tendency which had drawn under the control of this Government the local and reserved powers belonging to the States separately; the exercise of which had necessarily given that direction to its action, that created and placed in conflict the two great sectional, political parties.

But it was not sufficient, that the opinion of our candidate should not be fully in coincidence with our own. That alone could not be sufficient to ensure his success. It was necessary that he should have great personal popularity, distinct from political; to be, in a word, a successful military chieftain, which gives a popularity the most extensive, and the least affected by political considerations, and this was another fruit—a necessary fruit of consolidation. To these recommendations others must be added, in order to conciliate the feelings of the minority; that he should be identified, for instance, with them in an interest, possess the same property, and pursue the same industry. These qualifications, all of which were made indispensable by the juncture, pointed clearly to one man, and but one—General Jackson. There was, however, another circumstance which gave him great prominence and strength, and which greatly contributed to recommend him, as the opposing candidate. He had been defeated in the Presidential contest before the House of Representatives, (though returned with the highest vote,) under circumstances which were supposed to involve a disregard of the public voice. I do not deem it necessary to enter into an inquiry, as to the principles which controlled the election, or as to the view of the actors in that scene. Many considerations doubtless governed, and among others the feelings of prominent individuals in reference to the candidates, and their opinion of their respective qualifications, besides the one to which I have alluded, that of giving to the dominant interest that control over the executive which they had over the legislative department.

These combined motives, as I have stated, pointed distinctly to General Jackson. He was selected as the candidate of the minority, and the canvass entered into with all that zeal which belonged to the magnitude of the stake, united with the consciousness of honest and patriotic purpose. The leading objects were to effect a great political reform, and to arrest, if possible, what we believed to be a dangerous, and felt to be an oppressive, action of the Government. It is true that the qualifications of the individual, thus necessarily selected, were believed to be, in many important particulars, defective: that he lacked experience, extensive political information, and a command of temper; but it was believed that his firmness of purpose, and his natural sagacity, by calling to his aid the experience, the talents, and patriotism of those who supported his claims, would compensate for these defects.

I do not deem it necessary to enter into a history of this interesting and animated canvass, but there is one circumstance attending it so striking, so full of instruction, and so illustrative of the point under consideration, that I cannot pass it in silence. The canvass soon ran into the great and absorbing question of the day; as all ordinary diseases run into the prevailing one. Those in power sought to avail themselves of the popularity of the system with which they were identified. I speak it not in censure. It was natural, perhaps unavoidable, as connected with the morbid action of the Government. That portion of our allies, identified with the same interest, were, in like manner, and from the same motive and cause, forced into a rivalry of zeal for the same interest. The result of these causes, combined with the monopoly lizing spirit of the protective system, was the tariff of 1828—that disastrous measure which has brought so many calamities upon us, and put in peril the union and liberty of the country. It poured millions into the treasury, beyond even the most extravagant wants of the Government; and which, on the payment of the public debt, caused that hazardous juncture, resulting from a large undisposable surplus revenue, which has spread such deep corruption in every direction.

This disastrous event opened our eyes (I mean myself and those immediately connected with me) to the full extent of the danger and oppression of the protective system, and the hazard of failing to effect the reform intended, through the election of General Jackson. With these disclosures it became necessary to seek some other ultimate but more certain measure of protection. We turned to the constitution to find this remedy. We directed a more diligent and careful scrutiny into its provisions, in order to ascertain fully the nature and character of our political system. We found that certain and effectual remedy, in that great fundamental division of the powers of the system between this Government and its independent co-departments—the separate Governments of the States; to be called into action to arrest the unconstitutional acts of this Government, by the interposition of the State—the paramount source from which, as far as she is concerned, both Governments derive their power. But, in relying on this as our ultimate remedy, we did not abate our zeal in the Presidential canvass; we still hoped that General Jackson, if elected, would effect the necessary reform, and thereby supersede the necessity for calling into action the sovereign authority of the State, which we were anxious to avoid. With these views the two were pushed with equal zeal at the same time; which double operation commenced in the fall of 1828, but a few months after the passage of the tariff act of that year; and at the meeting of the legislature of the State, at the same period, a paper, known as the South Carolina Exposition, was reported to that body, containing a full development, as well on the constitutional point, as the operation of the protective system; preparatory to a state of things which might eventually render the action of the State necessary in order to protect her rights and interests, and to stay a course of policy which we believed would, if not arrested, prove destructive of liberty and the constitution. This movement, on the part of the State, places beyond all controversy the true character of the motives which governed us in the Presidential canvass. We were not the mere partisans of the candidate we supported. We aimed at a far more exalted object than his election—the defence of the rights of the State, and the security of liberty and of the constitution. To this we held his election entirely subordinate. This we pursued, unworried by selfish or ambitious views.

The contest terminated in the elevation of him who now presides; but it soon became apparent that our apprehension that we might be disappointed in the expected reform, was not without foundation. That occurred, which we ought, perhaps, to have expected, and which, under similar circumstances, has rarely failed to follow. He who was elevated to power proved to be more solicitous to retain what he had acquired, than to fulfil the expectation of those who had honestly contributed to his elevation, with a view to political reform. The tale may be readily told. Not a promise fulfilled—not a measure adopted to correct the abuses of the system—not a step taken to arrest the progress of consolidation, and to restore the confederative principles of our Government—not a look cast to the near approach of the payment of the public debt—nor an effort made to reduce gradually the duties, in order to prevent a surplus revenue, and to save the manufactories which had grown up under the protective system from the hazard of a shock caused by a sudden reduction of the duties. All were forgotten; and instead of attempting to control events, the Executive was only solicitous to occupy a position the most propitious to retain and increase his power. It required but little penetration to see that the position sought was a middle one between the contending parties; to be identified with no principle or policy, and to rely on the personal popularity of the incumbent, and the power and patronage of the Government, as the means of support. Hence a third party was formed; a personal and government party; made up of those who were attached to the person and the fortunes of a successful political chief. In a word, we had exhibited to our view, for the first time under our system, that most dangerous spectacle; in a country like ours, a prerogative party, who take their creed wholly from the mandate of their chief. The times were eminently propitious for the formation of such a party. Millions were poured into the Treasury by the high protective duties of 1828, furnishing an overflowing fund to secure the services of expectants and partisans. Against these superabundant means of power there was not, nor could there be, as things were situated, any effective resistance; all being necessarily withdrawn in consequence of the fierce contest between the two sections, which continued to rage with increasing violence; and which wasted the strength of the parties on each other, instead of opposing the rapidly-increasing power of the Executive. This, and not the personal or the military popularity of Gen. Jackson, is the true explanation of the fact, which has struck so many with wonder, that no misconduct, that no neglect of duty nor perversion of the power of government, however gross, has been able to shake his power and popularity; and that the people have looked idly on, apparently bereaved of every patriotic sentiment, or joined to swell the tide of power with shouts of approbation at every act, however outrageous. I do not doubt that his personal popularity, arising from his military achievements, contributed much to his elevation, (in fact it was one of the elements, as stated, which governed his selection as a candidate,) and to sustain him while in power; but I feel a perfect conviction, that, whatever advantage he has gained from this source, has been more than counterbalanced by the mismanagement and blunders of his administration; and that it would be equally difficult to expel from power any individual of sagacity and firmness, in possession of that department, under the circumstances which he has held it. Let us learn from the instructive history of this interesting period, that despotic power, under our system, commences with usurpation by this Government of the reserved powers of the States, and terminates in the concentration of all the powers of this Government in the person of a Chief Magistrate; and that, unless the first be resisted, the latter follows by a necessary, resistless, and inevitable law, as much so as that which governs the movements of the solar system.

As soon as we perceived that he whom we had elevated to office, was, as I have stated, more intent to retain and augment his power than to meet the just expectations on which he was supported, we totally despaired of relief and reform through the ordinary action of this Government, and separated, from that moment, from the administration; withdrew from the political contest here, and concentrated all our energies on that ultimate remedy which we had taken the precaution to prepare, in order to be called into action in the event of things taking the direction which they had.

An active discussion followed in the State, in which the principles and character of our political institutions were fully investigated, and a clear perception of the danger to which the country was exposed, was impressed upon the public mind. Still the determination was fixed not to act while there was a ray of hope of redress from this Government; and we accordingly waited the approach of the final payment of the public debt, when all pretexts for keeping up the extravagant duties of 1828 would cease. The near approach of that event caused the passage of the act of 1832, which was proclaimed on both sides, by the opposition and the administration, to be a final and permanent adjustment of the protective system. We felt every disposition to acquiesce in any reasonable adjustment, but it was impossible, consistently with our views of the nature of our rights, and the consequences involved in the contest, to submit to the act. The protective principle was fully maintained, the reduction was small; and the distribution of the burden between the two sections more equal than under the act of 1828. Every effort was made to magnify the amount of reduction. With that view false and deceptive calculations were made, and that too in official documents, in order to make the impression that the revenue would be reduced to the legitimate wants of the Government, or at least nearly so. We were not to be imposed upon by such calculations. We clearly perceived that the income would be at least from twenty-two to twenty-five millions of dollars—nearly double what the Government ought to expend, and we as clearly saw how much so large a permanent surplus must continue to corrupt the country, and undermine our political institutions. Seeing this, with a prospect of an indefinite continuance of the heavy and useless tax levied in the shape of duties, the State interposed, and, by that interposition, prepared to arrest within its limits the operation of the protective system—interposed, not to dissolve the Union, as was calumniously charged, but to compel an adjustment here or through a convention of the States; or, if an adjustment could not be had through either, to compel the Government to abandon the protective system.

The moment was portentous. Our political system rocked to the centre. Whatever diseases existed within, engendered by long corruption and abuse, were struck to the surface. The proclamation and the message of the President appeared, containing doctrines never before officially avowed—going far beyond the extreme tenets of the federal party, and in direct conflict with all that had ever been entertained by the republican party; and yet, such was the corruption, such the subservieney to power, that both parties, forgetting the past, abandoning every political principle, however sacred or long entertained, rushed to the embrace of the new creed—suddenly, instantly, without the slightest hesitation. Never did a free people exhibit so degraded a spectacle; give such evidence of the loose attachment to principle, or greater subservieney to power. At this moment, the current of events tended towards despotic authority in the person of the Chief Magistrate, on one side, and to disunion on the other—on one side, to clothe the President with power more than dictatorial, in order to maintain the ascendancy of the protective system; and, on the other, to resist the loss of liberty at every hazard. Fortunately for the country, there was at the time in the councils of the nation an individual who had the highest weight of authority with the supporters of that system—and who had done more to advance it than any other—who was the most intimately identified with it, and to whom, of course, the task of adjustment most appropriately belonged. Fortunately, also, he had the disposition and the fortitude to undertake it. An adjustment followed; the crisis of our disease was passed; the body politic from that moment became convalescent; the tendency to despotic power in the Executive was weakened—doubly weakened—by enabling those who had been so long wasting their strength in mutual conflict, to unite in resisting the usurpation of that department, as we this day behold, on the question of the deposits, and by diminishing the revenue—the food on which it had grown to such enormous dimensions. In a short time the decreasing scale of duties will cause the effect of this diminution to be felt; a period that will be hastened by that profuse and profligate disbursement which has nearly doubled the public expenditure, and which is so rapidly absorbing the surplus revenue.

I have said, that the crisis is passed; yet there remains some troublesome, and even dangerous symptoms, growing out of the former cause of the disease, which, however, may be overcome by skill and decision; unless, indeed, they should run into the lurking cause of another and most dangerous disease, with which it is intimately connected, and excite it into action; I mean the rotten state of the currency. There are indications of a very dangerous and alarming character of this tendency, at the point where the currency is the most disordered. I refer to the measure now pending before the legislature of New York, to pledge the capital and the industry of the State, to the amount of six millions of dollars, in support of the banks—a measure which a British minister (Lord Althorp,) with all the power of Parliament to sustain it, refused to adopt, because of its dangerous and corrupting tendency.

Let us now turn and inquire what would have been the course of events, if the State had not interposed, and things had been permitted to take their natural course. The act of 1832 was proclaimed, as I have stated, on both sides, to be a final settlement of the tariff question, and of course, was intended to be a permanent law of the land. The revenue, as I have already stated, under that act, and the sale of public lands, would, in all probability, be not less than twenty-five millions of dollars per annum: a sum exceeding the legitimate wants of the Government, estimated, on a liberal scale, by ten or eleven millions of dollars. Now, I ask, what would have been our situation with so large an annual surplus, and a fierce sectional conflict raging between the Northern and Southern portions of the Union? If we find it so difficult to resist the usurpation of the Executive department with a temporary surplus revenue, to continue, at most, but for one or two years, how much more difficult would it have been to resist, with a permanent surplus, such as I have stated? If we find it so difficult to resist that department, when those who have been separated by the tariff are united, how utterly hopeless would have been the prospect of resistance were that question now open, and those who are now united against Executive encroachments, were exhausting their strength against each other. Is it not obvious that the Executive power, under such circumstances, would have been irresistible; and that we should have been impelled rapidly to despotism or disunion? One or the other would certainly have been our fate, if events had been permitted to move in the channel in which they were then flowing; and despotism much more probably than disunion. It is almost without example that free states should be disunited in consequence of the violence of internal conflicts; but very numerous are the cases in which such conflicts have terminated in the establishment of despotic power. The danger of disunion is small; that of despotism, great. We have, however, I trust, escaped for the present, the danger of both, for which we are indebted to that great conservative principle of our system, which considers this Government, and that of the States, as co-departments; and which proved successful, although rejected by every State but one; and although called into action on the most trying occasion that can be imagined, and under the most adverse circumstances.

I said that the danger has passed for the present. The seeds of the disease still remain in the system. The act which I propose to repeal accompanied the adjustment of the tariff. It was passed solely on the ground of recognising the principles in which it originated, and to establish them, as far as an act of Congress could do so, as the permanent law of the land. While these seeds remain, it will be in vain to expect a healthy state of the body politic. Alienation, the loss of confidence, suspicion, jealousy on the part of the weaker section, at least, who have experienced the bitter fruits that spring from those principles, must accompany the movements of this Government. But these seeds will not remain in the system without germinating. Unless removed, the genius of consolidation will again exhibit itself; but in what form, whether in the revival of the question from whose dangers we have not yet wholly escaped—whether between North and South, East and West—whether between the slave-holding and the non-slave-holding States, the rich and poor, or the capitalists and the operatives, it is not for me to say; but that it will again revive, (unless by your votes you expunge the act from your statute book,) to divide, distract, and corrupt the community, is certain. Nor is it much less so, that when it again revives, it will pass through all those stages which we have witnessed, and, in all human probability, consummate itself, and terminate our hopes in a military despotism. Reverse the scene—let the act be obliterated forever from among our laws, let the principle of consolidation be forever suppressed, and that admirable and beautiful federal system, which I have so imperfectly portrayed, be firmly established, and renovated health and vigor will be restored to the body politic, and our country may yet realize that permanent state of liberty, prosperity, and greatness, which we all once so fondly hoped was our allotted destiny.

Mr. CLAY observed, that this bill had been introduced upon leave given to a member of the Senate, and, according to the invariable practice of that body, if not to established rule, it should be referred to some committee, to be considered and reported on, before finally disposed of. He had hoped that some other member would have moved the reference; but, as he observed that the President was about putting the question on ordering the bill to a third reading, he thought it his duty to make the motion. It would be perceived that there were two parts to the bill—that the Senator from South Carolina sought to repeal—one was military and temporary, and the other judicial and permanent; and if it should be thought proper to repeal the first, he doubted the propriety of repealing the last. For one, he would say, if it soothed one feeling, if it solaced one American heart, in this widely-extended republic, he should have no objection to the repeal of the military part of the bill, but would vote for it with pleasure, though he should object to the repeal of the other. He should have no difficulty, provided the repeal were put on any other grounds than those of the triumph of nullification. To that, he never could give his aid or consent. He did not rise for the purpose of making a speech in reply to what had fallen from the Senator from South Carolina. To many of that gentleman's views, he gave his entire assent; but, he must add, that with many others he could not agree. At all events, the discussion was not at all profitable at this peculiar juncture. Sir, we have got, said Mr. C., a nullification infinitely more dangerous, not in South Carolina, but in Washington, which threatens destruction to the liberties of the country, by an entire absorption of all the powers of the General Government in the hands of one man. The nullification of our Southern sister was by-gone. Was this, then, the time for abstruse propositions and metaphysical discussions? It would be better to let them sleep, and for gentlemen to buckle on their armor to meet and avert the present and practical danger.

He had said that he did not mean to reply to the Senator from South Carolina; but there were one or two observations that had fallen from him that demanded a passing notice. After the compliment paid him (Mr. C.) for the part he had felt it his duty, under all circumstances, to take in the settlement of the tariff question, a measure that had commanded that Senator's approbation, he had hoped that that subject would have been permitted to remain undisturbed. So far as he knew the sentiments of the country, and of the friends with whom he acted, they were willing to abide by the compromise, fully, fairly, and faithfully, and not to suffer it to be violated, but to make a fair experiment of its provisions. He believed a disposition prevailed in the country, if, at the expiration of the limited time—that is, in 1843—a just measure of protection cannot then, by common consent, be extended to those few articles of American industry that may then need it, to continue the experiment so far as completely to test the operation of the compromise. This was his feeling; this was also, he presumed, the feeling of the honorable member himself; and he did not think, therefore, that this question, or any question relating to the constitutional principles of the system of protection, should have been brought up.

He did not agree with the honorable member, that there was any thing like consolidation in the exercise of those powers of the General Government in relation to a protective tariff. The honorable member had traced the exercise of that power to a single clause of the constitution; but he, at the same time, knew that there were other clauses under which the power had been claimed. The clause, for instance, to regulate commerce had been more frequently relied on than the one adverted to by the Senator. He, Mr. C., did not agree that the legislative branch of the Government had ever displayed any tendency towards consolidation. Where had it been shown? (He did not speak of the executive branch of the Government, whose tendency was, he admitted, not so much towards consolidation as to the concentration of all the powers of the constitution.) What power had been claimed by Congress not granted by the constitution? There was scarcely one solitary power claimed by any succeeding Congress which had not been asserted or exercised by the first Congress assembled after the convention—that Congress which came fresh from the convention that formed the constitution, which contained several members of that convention, and, among others, that eminent Virginian, yet spared to his country, who has been emphatically called the Father of the constitution. Was it in the establishment of a national bank that Congress exhibited a tendency to consolidation? The first bank was established by the first Congress that assembled in 1789. Was it in the adoption of the protective policy? It was distinctively asserted and announced by the same first Congress that that was the true policy of the country; and let it be recollected that, when once the principle was thus settled, the degree of protection became a mere measure of detail. The principle was established by the Congress of 1789, and, up to this day, it had been again and again acted on under almost every administration, and sanctioned by all the distinguished patriots, with greater or less restriction, who have had the direction of our national affairs. Was it in the establishment of an army and navy, or in a system of internal improvements? Why, in reality, the participation of the Government in internal improvements was first brought about under that Chief Magistrate who was called the Father of democracy, and to whose authority no man more readily defers than the Senator from South Carolina. He knew it was under the compact with Ohio that internal improvements were first sanctioned; but without the authority of the constitution to make appropriations for such a purpose, no compact could confer upon Congress the power. Where, then, was the tendency to consolidation manifested by Congress during the progress of this Government?

The Senator from South Carolina had spoken of the vast revenues which had been collected under the laws which had been passed for the protection of American industry, and especially under the tariff of 1824. These revenues had enabled the Government to pay the public debt. But the accumulation of a surplus revenue had never been an object with the friends of the tariff. So far from their looking to an accumulation of revenue, the friends of that measure were reproached with having adopted a system of policy that would bankrupt the Treasury, and render a resort to direct taxation imperatively necessary. The very fear of diminishing the revenue prevented some members from giving their assent to the bill which passed at that time, who would otherwise have been favorably disposed towards it.

He had very little to say in relation to Presidential elections, and the share taken by different parties in them; but if those who contributed in 1828 to the elevation of the present Chief Magistrate, and who, by doing so, had brought such a train of ills on the country, could find a consolation in their own hearts, he would be the last to bereave them of it. We have been told, said Mr. C., that they contributed to that event in order to avoid the protective policy. They hoped that his (the President's) opinions were more favorable to their interests than were those of his competitor, yet he voted for the tariff of 1824. Let us look back, said Mr. C., and see, also, whether they were not practising something like (to call it by no harsher term) a misconception on each other. If they supported him on the grounds of his opposition to the tariff, did they not support him on the grounds of a secret and undivulged opposition? And were they not co-operating with the State of Pennsylvania and other parts of the Union, which supported him because of his friendship for the tariff, and where there was scarcely an individual who did not believe him to be as much devoted to the protective policy as any man in the country? This, however, was a subject he would not further enlarge on—the present Chief Magistrate was supported and was elected, it seems, under hopes that he would lessen the evils of the tariff.

He trusted that his election would impress the people of this country with one important truth, which deserved general inculcation—that it is a duty they owe themselves and their dearest interests, in the selection of a Chief Magistrate, to look well to his previous character, conduct, and habits; to ascertain his principles; to scrutinize his motives of action; to examine his passions, prejudices, and temper of mind; and to weigh well, in all respects, the consequences likely to ensue from their choice, and not to decide under the pressure of a single grievance, real or imaginary. Well; success followed the exertions of the Senator from South Carolina, and those with whom he co-operated, in the elevation of the present Chief Magistrate; and what has followed? Where are the principles which brought him into power? Which of the various parties who combined to secure his elevation, has not been disappointed? What are the distinct principles of this administration? Is it in favor of the tariff? No. Against it? No. In favor of internal improvements? Yes. Against them? Yes. For nullification? Yes, that which emanates from Washington. Against nullification? Yes, that of the State of South Carolina. Is it for State rights? Yes; look at the opening message of December, 1832; that was a thorough-going State rights paper—strong enough to satisfy the Senator from South Carolina, or the most ardent of that school. Is it against State rights? Yes; look at the proclamation of the next short week; that proclamation which, according to the Senator from South Carolina, had outstripped all the doctrines of consolidation ever before advanced in this country. Mr. C. thought with the Senator from South Carolina—he thought the proclamation, take it as a whole, (although there were many parts of it that met his approbation,) as ultra as ever came from the most high-toned of any party that ever existed in this country. What had we got by the election of this Chief Magistrate, he would ask the Senator from South Carolina? No! he would not taunt that gentleman with such an inquiry; he would rather ask some of the friends of the President, what were his principles? When the historian, or biographer, some future Plutarch, came to write the lives of the great men who have been elevated to the office of President, he would find some leading measures by which each of our former Presidents had been distinguished. Mr. Jefferson, for instance, for the reform he introduced in our institutions, and for the acquisition of Louisiana. In the administration of the other Presidents something remarkable would also be found, characteristic of the chief, or of his term.

But what had distinguished the character of this administration? Why, his friend from South Carolina, who had renounced his first opinions of the President, and who supported his first election from the purest and most disinterested motives, without being influenced by one particle of ambition, would be somewhat embarrassed to solve the problem. What were his (the President's) principles? For a bank? No. Against it? No; for he is in favor of forty of them, if they are under his exclusive control, and responsible to him alone. When the future historian shall inquire what were the distinguishing traits, the predominating principles of this administration, what would he learn? Why, he (Mr. C.) did not know what they were; but he thought they consisted in peace, simple, unadulterated Jacksonism. "Down with the bank; down with internal improvements; down with the American system; down with the best currency that any country ever had; down with the constitution; but give us pure, simple, unadulterated Jacksonism!"—"Hurra for Jackson!"

Mr. C. then moved to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. FORSYTH said that he should vote in favor of the motion of the honorable Senator from Kentucky, for the re-committal of the bill. It was known to every member of the Senate, that the military provisions of the act a question were limited to the end of the present session of Congress; and, as there was no probability that a practical application of them would be needed by that time, therefore no objection, he thought, would be made to their being repealed. At the last session of Congress, when this subject was under consideration, he had made a fruitless attempt to limit all the provisions of the bill to the period at which those of a military character were to expire, and he regretted that he did not succeed. There were many clauses in that act to which he did not agree, and one of them he would now notice. It was that which referred criminal charges from the State tribunals to those of the United States, in the first instance. Whatever justification there might be for the passing of the first part of the bill, under the then existing circumstances, he conceived the adoption of the course of which he had just spoken as quite unjustifiable, and calculated to give offence to the citizens of South Carolina, inasmuch as it showed a want of confidence in the justice and integrity of the State tribunals.

He would have had no objection to vote for the repeal of the whole bill, did he not doubt, with the honorable Senator from Kentucky—notwithstanding the explanations which had been given—that it would give rise to party triumph, to the triumph of principles which he considered to be infinitely more dangerous than any incorporated in the bill. It was known to the Senate, and to the public, that that act stood in a very different position now than at the close of the last session of Congress; that South Carolina had chosen to apply the principles of nullification to the bill, and it was interdicted in that State. He could not doubt, then, under these circumstances, the correctness of the principles of the bill.

APRIL 9, 1834.]

Repeal of the Force Act.

[SENATE.]

He had frequently said that the doctrine of nullification was by far the most dangerous one that had ever been adopted by any party in this country. He hoped the subject would be laid before the proper committee, in order that they might do what was necessary—neither giving too much power to the General Government, nor yielding too much to the unjust pretensions of a State. He held in his hand the nullifying ordinance which led to the act of Congress, and which he hoped would be referred with the bill.

[Some remarks were here made by Mr. PRESTON, which were not reported, and some further observations in reply by Mr. CLAY.]

Mr. POINDEXTER said: He had no objection to a reference of the bill under consideration to the Committee on the Judiciary; he was willing that the act, proposed to be repealed, might be carefully examined, and if it should be found to contain any provision worth preserving, that it might be made an exception, on the passage of the repealing act. He thought the entire law of the last session, commonly called the force act, ought to be repealed, as he deemed it an unconstitutional measure in all its parts. A distinction had been taken between the military provisions of the act, and those which related to the judiciary. The honorable Senator from Kentucky assents to the repeal of the former, whilst he desires to retain the latter as a permanent part of our judicial system. Now, sir, said Mr. P., I regard those sections of the act which confer power on the courts of the United States, as equally, if not more extravagant and dangerous encroachments on the constitution, than the immense power which the act confers on the Chief Magistrate to coerce a sovereign State of the Union by military force. The powers conferred on the courts of the United States by this act, if carried out to their utmost extent, totally annihilate the State courts on all the subjects which they embrace, criminal and civil. I hold it to be a clear and well-settled principle, that neither the Supreme Court of the United States, nor the inferior tribunals, can claim or exercise any jurisdiction, which is not expressly given in the constitution of the United States, by which the judicial department of the Government is established. No jurisdiction can be given to these courts by law, and yet this act confers on them new and extraordinary powers, not recognised in the constitution, and totally subversive of the criminal jurisprudence of every State in the Union. An officer of the customs may commit murder, under color of necessity in the execution of the duties of his office, when in point of fact, no such necessity existed: he may be prosecuted for this outrage on the life of a citizen, in the State courts where the offence was committed, and his act provides the certain means by which he may escape punishment, even if he be guilty of the foulest murder. He is authorized, by petition or habeas corpus, to be released from State prosecution, and to transfer the case to the circuit court of the United States, when, without indictment or prosecutor, the court may proceed to hear and determine the case; and what renders such a proceeding still more ridiculous and absurd, the courts of the United States have no power, except in a few specified cases, either to take cognizance of a murder committed within the limits of a State, or to pronounce sentence on the offender after conviction. I mention this as one of the singular features of the act, without intending to give the subject a more enlarged examination at this time. On the subject of nullification, which has been introduced into the discussion this morning, I am one of those unfortunate individuals who do not comprehend its meaning.

When I am asked, as I have often been, the question, "Are you a nullifier?" I answer by asking another question, "What do you mean by nullification?" There are so many various and conflicting versions given of this despised word, that no one can with safety either avow or disavow his belief in the theory connected with it, until he receive the definition of each individual who objects to the doctrine. If it means, as we are told it does, in the proclamation of President Jackson, treason, rebellion, revolution, or disunion, then am I no nullifier. If it is understood in the light of a remedy by State interposition, to counteract usurped power on the part of the Federal Government, and thereby protect each State in the full enjoyment of its reserved rights, then I maintain, that to this extent, it is the true theory of the constitution. I concur entirely in the opinion of Alexander Hamilton, an ultra-federalist, that the laws of the United States are binding, both on the States and on the people; but these laws are restricted to a certain sphere, and, when they depart from this sphere, "they are no longer supreme or binding."

This is the nullifying principle of Hamilton, to which I yield my hearty assent. I hold it to be the right and the duty of the States, in all cases of a gross and palpable usurpation of power not delegated to Congress by the constitution, to interpose, by a solemn declaration, that the act being a violation of the constitution, is neither "supreme nor binding," and no law within the limits of the State making the declaration. I consider this the great conservative principle of the constitution: it is essential to the perpetuity of the Union, and the purity of our republican institutions. If we destroy the checks and balances of our system, there will remain no means by which the strides of arbitrary power, either executive or legislative, can be arrested. I am in favor of preserving, unimpaired, these safeguards of liberty, without which this Government would very soon reach the climax of despotism. Sir, I must be permitted to express my astonishment, when I hear honorable Senators on this floor denounce, in the strongest terms, this principle of State interposition, and declare their intention of voting against the repeal of this very high-handed measure, lest it might seem to afford a triumph to nullification, which they deem more dangerous in its tendency than the power over the purse and the sword, which this force act, as it is called, confers on the President.

My surprise is increased when I hear these declarations from a Senator who represents a State which is, and has ever been, the hot-bed of nullification. I ask, what right has a Senator, who defends the proceedings of his own State in acts of resistance to Federal authority, to stand up here, and reproach the honorable Senators from South Carolina for a like defence of the State which they represent, under similar circumstances? Sir, there is not a State in this Union, with perhaps one or two exceptions, which has not, in some form or other, resisted the action of this Government. I challenge any honorable Senator to rise in his place, and pronounce, in the face of the Senate and the nation, that the State from which he comes has on no occasion asserted the right to arrest the operation of an unconstitutional act of Congress. Let them take that manly ground, and I shall be more ready to credit the sincerity with which they deal out denunciations against a sister State of the Union. I take it upon myself to say, that there are but few Senators here who would venture to claim for the State which he represents, exemption from the imputations which they so freely cast upon the State of South Carolina.

The honorable Senator from Georgia [Mr. FORSYTH] has laid on the table an ordinance of the convention in South Carolina, annulling or nullifying this force act, which he proposes to refer to the Committee on the Judiciary. I make no objection to the reference of the paper, but its introduction here has given rise to some reflections, which I will briefly state to the Senate. Why has this ordinance been passed over in silence, without attracting the slightest attention from the Chief Magistrate? The first nullifying ordinance passed by the convention, was held by the President to be treasonable in its character and effects, and dangerous to the stability of the Union. It drew forth from the President the most bitter invectives and menaces, in the form of a proclamation, under the broad seal—a proclamation issued in violation of law and the constitution, promulgating political doctrines and theories inconsistent with our free institutions, and never before broached in this country; denouncing the fundamental law of a State, demanding its repeal, and threatening punishment on the people of the State, and more particularly their leaders, by the strong arm of military power, unless the demand should be promptly complied with.

This second act of nullification, adopted by the same convention, and based on the same principles, has not been deemed worthy of the slightest notice from the President, and has scarcely been alluded to by the friends of the administration in debate, until the honorable gentleman from Georgia had deemed it to be his duty to lay a certified copy of the ordinance on the table.

No proclamation has been fulminated under the broad seal; no message has been received, calling for the army and the navy and the militia, to put down nullification and preserve the Union; but the ordinance is permitted quietly to repose among the archives of South Carolina, without exciting either alarm or apprehension in the mind of the Chief Magistrate, for the safety of our "Federal Union." This might, indeed, be considered a triumph of nullification, by the tacit acquiescence of President Jackson, if we did not know the motives which influenced him to put forth the solemn mockery, contained in his memorable proclamation. These motives, both personal and political, are well known and properly appreciated by the American people. I should be glad to be informed, how one nullifying ordinance can be considered treason and rebellion, threatening the overthrow of the Government, while another, of the same character, passed by the same convention, is deemed to be perfectly harmless and inoffensive, calling for no action, executive or legislative, to counteract its deleterious consequences? Mr. President, my opinions on all the questions brought into discussion on the passage of this force act, which it is now proposed to repeal, were given in extenso at the last session of Congress. I do not now mean to enter again into the discussion of these questions. I repeat my assent to the proposed reference of the bill on the table; and when it shall be returned to the Senate for its final action, I shall take occasion to present my views more fully on the subject.

Mr. FORSYTH said: The honorable Senator from South Carolina had inquired what was his object in procuring that ordinance; but as the gentleman had expressed no difficulty as to its being referred, he (Mr. F.) should say nothing further on the subject.

The bill (accompanied by the ordinance) was then referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

THURSDAY, APRIL 10.

MAINE MEMORIAL.

Mr. SHEPLEY rose and said he had been requested to present to the Senate a copy of the proceedings of a public meeting, (the original of which had been sent to a member of the other House,) from the towns of Gardiner and Pittston, in the State of Maine, representing that they, in common with others, had experienced great inconvenience from the present unexampled scarcity of money. They forbore, however, from expressing any opinion as to the causes of pecuniary pressure. They did not enter into the question whether it had been produced by the Bank of the United States, or by the officers of the Government, nor did they attribute any blame either to the bank, or to the Government, although they experienced great inconvenience and distress. In one particular, however, they did express an opinion, and that was in favor of a bank to regulate the money concerns of the country, in such a manner as to enable them to carry on their business without embarrassment. The proceedings were signed by 634 individuals, without distinction of party, equal to the average number of voters of both the political parties in the two places he had named. The meeting was composed of merchants, traders, dealers in lumber, professional men, mariners, &c., and several directors of banks. He took great pleasure, Mr. S. said, in presenting these proceedings, because their language, as well as their character, exhibited a respect to those they addressed, and a regard for the wisdom of Congress, strongly contrasted with the violence and asperity which had characterized many of the memorials recently presented to the Senate. Mr. S. then moved that the proceedings be read, printed, and referred to the Committee on Finance; which was ordered accordingly.

The report of the select committee on the contested election of a Senator from the State of Rhode Island, was taken up as the order of the day; and, on motion of Mr. POINDEXTER, was again laid on the table, and made the order of the day for this day week.

The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of John McCartney.

[It appears that Mr. McCartney lived in the State of Alabama, close to the Indian frontier. His cattle had strayed across the line of demarcation, and found their way into the Indian territory. There they were seized by Lieut. Houston, who have been ordered by Gen. Jackson to remove intruders and their property from the Indian lands. The cattle, in spite of application, and the exhibition of proof by the applicant, that the cattle were his, and that he was a settler in Alabama, and not an intruder on the Indian lands, were driven to Nashville, whither he followed them, but failed to prevent them from being sold by the Marshal. The claim was resisted on the ground that Mr. Cartney ought to have sued the Marshal, and thus sought redress through the ordinary channels of the law. It was also resisted on the ground that the Treasury could not be made liable for damage done to any citizen, in his property, by an officer of the Government, acting in the execution of the law. On the other side it was contended, that, if Congress would have felt bound to indemnify the officer who had seized the cattle, they were equally bound to satisfy the loser.]

Mr. NAUDAIN, by direction of the committee, moved the indefinite postponement of the bill.

The motion was discussed, in opposition, by Mr. MOORE, on whose call the yeas and nays were ordered. by Mr. SOUTHARD, on the affirmative side of the question; and further, by Mr. POINDEXTER, Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, Mr. NAUDAIN, Mr. KING of Alabama, Mr. PORTER, Mr. SPRAGUE, and Mr. EWING.

The question was then taken on the motion indefinitely to postpone the bill, and decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Clay, Clayton, King of Ga., Knight, Leigh, Naudain, Smith, Southard, Sprague, Swift, Tomlinson—11.

NAYS.—Messrs. Black, Brown, Ewing, Frelinghuysen, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, Kane, Kent, King of Ala., Liun, McKean, Mangum, Moore, Morris, Poindexter, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Robinson, Shepley, Silsbee, Tallmadge, White, Wilkins, Wright.—27.

So the Senate refused to postpone the bill; which was then reported without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

offered by Mr. CLAYTON, to change the rule of the Senate on the subject of the presentation of petitions and reports.

The amendment, which had been under consideration on a former day, was agreed to.

Mr. POINDEXTER moved to amend the resolution, by adding the words, "and every petition or memorial shall be referred, as a matter of course, unless any member shall object to such reference."

Mr. CLAYTON advocated his resolution, in its modified form, as tending to the convenience of the Senate, and the more orderly disposition of business.

The motion to lay on the table was renewed, and decided in the negative.

The amendment offered by Mr. POINDEXTER was then agreed to; and the resolution, as amended, was then adopted.

After taking up and going through with several bills from the other House, the Senate adjourned.

VERMONT MEMORIAL.

Mr. PRENTISS presented the proceedings and resolutions of a large public meeting held in the town of Rutland, Vermont; also a memorial from the same place, remonstrating against the removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States, ascribing the pecuniary embarrassments under which they are suffering to that measure, and praying for a restoration of the deposits, with a re-charter of the bank.

Mr. P. said, that he had been requested to present to the Senate the resolutions of a meeting recently held in the county of Rutland, in Vermont, and also a memorial from a large number of the citizens of the same county. The memorial, said Mr. P., contains the names of sixteen hundred and nineteen freemen and voters, belonging to all occupations and parties, and embraces men of the first respectability—men of elevated standing and commanding influence in society. The memorialists, sir, represent that there exists among them a general and extraordinary embarrassment, a severe and calamitous pressure, which affects all classes and employments, and must soon prostrate and destroy, unless speedy relief is obtained, all the various interests and business of the community. They ascribe the embarrassment and distress which prevail, to the derangement of the currency, and the consequent prostration of confidence and credit, produced by the sudden and unexpected removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States. This measure is regarded by them as rash, impolitic, and unauthorized by law; as an act of injustice, a violation of national faith, and a plain abuse of power. They consider the measure rash and impolitic, because it was premature and unnecessary, and because it has been the primary cause of the calamities which now bear so oppressively upon the people. They consider it unjust and a breach of faith, because the bank, by its charter, was entitled to the possession of the deposits so long as the money was safe, and the bank afforded the facilities and performed the services it was required to render. They consider it unauthorized by law, because the authority to remove the deposits was limited by the nature and subject-matter of the trust, and could be exercised only for reasons founded either in the insecurity of the public funds or in the failure of the bank to execute the duties imposed upon it by its charter; and because it would be repugnant to every sound rule of interpretation, to construe the special authority, thus conferred, into an unlimited discretion to act upon general and vague considerations of the public convenience and welfare. They consider it an abuse of power, because the authority was delegated to, and vested in, the Secretary of the Treasury, as the special agent or officer of the law, to be exercised by him on his own judgment and his own responsibility; and the removal, though in form the act of the Secretary, was virtually effected, through the medium of the appointing power, by the Executive, who had no legal or constitutional control over the subject. They also expressed a settled conviction, that the commerce and trade of the country, the regulation of the currency, and the management of the financial affairs of the Government, render a national bank indispensable. The county, sir, from which this memorial comes, in the extent of its agricultural pursuits, and the amount of its productions, is exceeded by no other county in the State. The proceeds of the sales of wool, produced in the county the last year, amounted to but little short of three hundred dollars. In this article the farmers are generally and largely interested; but from present prospects there will be no market for wool, or if any, it must be sold at a very reduced price, and the disappointment and loss to the agricultural interest, in this particular, must be great and severe. The county also embraces numerous villages, in which mercantile, manufacturing, and mechanical business has been carried on with great activity and success; but all the various branches of industry in these villages, lately so prosperous and flourishing, are likely to be entirely prostrated. Though the county is large in population, as well as territory, it can hardly be said that there exists, among the people, any difference of opinion in reference to the ill-advised and disastrous measure which has produced the extensive evils complained of; and it is due to the citizens of that county to say, that a people more intelligent and patriotic, more sound, constant, and uniform in their principles, more steady, firm, and constant in their republican attachments, and more disposed as well as competent to judge and act correctly upon public questions, does not exist in any portion of that or any other State in the Union. Those of them who have signed the memorial, disclaim all party feelings and considerations in the expression of their opinions; and there is no reason to doubt that their object, and their only object, is, to sustain principles deemed essential, to the welfare and prosperity of the country, to the maintenance of the constitutional powers of Congress, and the preservation of public liberty.

The proceedings were read, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

OHIO MEMORIALS.

Mr. EWING presented a memorial signed by upwards of a thousand of the citizens and electors of the county of Franklin, State of Ohio; also, a memorial from 4,310 citizens of the county of Hamilton and city of Cincinnati, in the same State, complaining of great pecuniary embarrassment, which the memorialists ascribe to the removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States, and praying for their restoration, and a re-charter of the bank. On presenting these memorials, Mr. Ewing addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. President: I am charged with the presentation of a memorial signed by about one thousand persons, all of them, as I am assured, citizens and qualified voters of the county of Franklin, in the State of Ohio. The occupations of the signers are set down with their names, and you will perceive that they are men engaged in all the various avocations of life. Many of them I personally know; I know them all as a community; and I venture to say, that, for talents and acquirements, active enterprise and general worth, they will bear fair comparison with an equal aggregate of citizens in any portion of our country. Members of the learned professions, farmers, merchants, mechanics, laborers, urged by a common impulse, without distinction of party, unite in presenting their common opinions and common feelings before the authorities of the nation. When I say this memorial is signed without distinction of party, I mean simply this, that I see upon it the names of many individuals who have been heretofore arranged on opposite sides in our great political contest; for their present opinions and feelings on any subject not explained in that paper, I cannot, and I do not, pretend to vouch. The memorial is couched in terms wholly unexceptionable. They are free citizens who speak to us through that memorial, and they speak in firm, but respectful language, the sentiments of freemen; and I take great pleasure in saying that there is not one sentiment which they have expressed, which does not meet my entire and cordial concurrence. First and chiefly, they protest against the removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States, which they characterize as an act of Executive usurpation. They deny that the law gives the President any power over the Treasury of the nation; they affirm that that Treasury was, and ought to be, under the control and superintendence of Congress alone, and that, by this high-handed and dangerous measure, the President has seized the public purse, and holds it in the same hand which wields the sword. They trace the commercial embarrassment and pecuniary distress of our country to the shock upon credit and confidence which this act has produced, and pronounce it the natural and obvious consequence of that act.

They say that the commercial embarrassment and pecuniary distress, which commenced long since in the Atlantic cities, are now beginning to be severely felt throughout the Western country: they say that this Executive measure has deranged the fiscal operations of the country; has produced embarrassment, jealousy, and distrust among moneyed corporations; and has shaken public confidence in the stability of our institutions, and in the supremacy of our laws; and they add, that to them it appears evident that the evils now experienced, and the still greater impending, can only be averted by restoring to Congress their constitutional power of controlling the public deposits; to the violated laws their supremacy; and to the bank, so long as it exists, its legal rights; and they declare their conviction, that it is a solemn duty which Congress owe to the country, to use all constitutional means in their power to reclaim their violated rights, and not retire from their posts till the great object is accomplished.

I am also charged with the presentation of a memorial signed by 4,310 citizens and voters of the county of Hamilton, in the same State, and that, too, without distinction of party. I know, also, many individuals whose names are signed to this memorial, and I know them as men of the very first character and standing, on both sides of the political questions which have heretofore agitated and divided us. The memorial speaks of great pecuniary and commercial distress and embarrassment, and, without saying any thing of its cause, prays for a re-charter of the Bank of the United States, with suitable modifications, as the proper and efficient remedy. A letter accompanying this memorial informs me that two-thirds of all the voters in the county, which is itself a congressional district, have signed or are ready to sign it. I have no doubt of the correctness of the statement. The writer is a deliberate, cautious, and intelligent man, and has heretofore been, and, I presume, is still, a friend and supporter of the present Chief Magistrate. Such, sir, are the evidences of public opinion in those important sections of the State of Ohio.

The city of Cincinnati was early and deeply affected by this unfortunate blow upon commercial credit and business. It is a new community—the city, great and flourishing as we see it, is but of yesterday—it is rising steadily and rapidly into wealth and importance—it is increasing in population—it is, or rather has been, extending and improving its manufactures, and expanding its commerce. Next to New Orleans, it is the emporium of Western commerce—next to Pittsburg, the first manufacturing city of the West. But the means for the advantageous employment of capital exceed the actual capital which it contains—for it is possessed rather of vigor, and energy, and a capacity of acquisition, than for actual accumulated wealth. Hence a large proportion of the mercantile and much of the manufacturing business of the city has been carried on upon credit, or capital drawn from abroad; consequently this shock upon the credit of the country, and the sudden withdrawal of that credit and capital, have affected that city most disastrously. One among the worst of its consequences, is the depression of the price of all our great staples in New Orleans and the Eastern cities, or rather the total want of a market, and a cash purchaser at any price, which leaves the products of the country on the hands of the merchant, or compels him to sell at a destructive sacrifice. Many, very many, mercantile men—active, enterprising men, who have spent the early part of their lives in business, and were amassing property sufficient to support their families, and sustain themselves in advanced life, have seen every thing swept from them, and ruin and bankruptcy staring them in the face. Many others still struggle with adversity, and sustain their falling fortunes, in the hope that Congress may devise and adopt some remedy for the ills which are impending over them.

The farmers, the yeomanry of the country, have also joined in this memorial. They are not so immediately affected by the present state of things, as their neighbors of the city. They have generally sold their produce, and received the price in better times; and it is the purchasers, not themselves, who are the immediate sufferers. Nevertheless, aware that the prosperity of their city is their own prosperity—too generous not to sympathize in the unmerited sufferings brought on their neighbors and friends, by a rash and unwarranted act, they also unite and ask for a speedy remedy. They are aware, too, that, if the present state of things continue, they also shall feel, in the depression of their own property, and the stagnation of business, their share of the sufferings under which the mercantile community now labors. But there is no class of men which feel the pressure more severely than the mechanic and the laborer; indeed, their whole business, the whole means which they possess of supporting their families and bettering their condition, depend upon the activity of commerce, and the safety and the reasonable abundance of a circulating medium. The case is different with men who have money at command, or those who possess a fixed salary, or a regular income. With them and the rest of the community there is no bond of common interest or common sympathy, as respects these deeply-important and all-absorbing subjects. The fall of produce, and the fall of lands, and the fall of property, profits rather than injures them. If the barrel of flour, which the farmer has to sell, is reduced from four dollars to two dollars and fifty cents, the man who receives a salary or an income of three thousand dollars in cash per annum, is raised in wealth and effective means, in comparison with the farmer, nearly one-half—his $3,000 is as good, in this state of things, as $5,000 was in the flourishing state of our country.

The relation between debtor and creditor is changed in a manner most fatal to the unfortunate debtor, and, in this state of things, every debtor is unfortunate. Money alone can pay debts, or property graded by the standard of money. If a farmer owed 500 dollars in September last, he could pay it with 125 barrels of flour; and if that were the commodity which he had prepared for its payment, he might fairly suppose that he owed but 125 barrels of flour instead of 500 in money. If he be called upon to pay it now, and if he can sell his flour for any price, and pay the debt with it, he must provide 200, instead of 125 barrels, to make good the payment. The advantage gained by the creditor and lost by the debtor is thus enormous; and it is so with every other species of property which can be converted into the means of paying debts.

The state of things in that section of the country, sad as it is, has not reached the point of its greatest intensity; the causes which produced it are still in progress, and hurrying rapidly onward to that point. I had hoped that the evil could have been removed, that the remedy could have been applied here, before the wide-spread ruin would have extended itself over my own State; but those hopes have been disappointed, and we must now look the evil in the face, as we cannot avert it. The State of Ohio, young, prosperous, rich in natural resources, and containing the germs of future wealth is fully and perfectly as any similar extent of country under heaven, is, nevertheless, a dealer on borrowed capital. The great enterprise which she began and executed, and of which her citizens are so justly proud, was based upon borrowed capital. She now pays to the Eastern cities, and through them to foreigners, more than a quarter of a million of annual interest, for money thus wisely borrowed and judiciously expended. In ordinary times, the payment of this interest would have been easy, indeed no one would have felt it; but now, come through what channel it may—through tolls on our canals, or direct tax upon our farmers and houses—it is a drain of money which we cannot well spare; it is taking away the small remnant of that circulating medium which the Executive experiment has left us. If we estimate the amount of that interest by the reduced prices of every thing that is to command money, that quarter of a million now is more than equal to $400,000 in the ordinary state of our currency, and when our staples commanded their former prices.

The season for the shipment of our produce has now arrived, and the pay-day for the bills of exchange purchased on the credit of those shipments is at hand. Be the markets good or bad, the produce must be despatched, and the merchant will freight it with a heavy heart, for the prices at which it must be now sold promise not profit, but ruin. Many bills must be protested; not all, indeed; for those merchants who can do so will apply other resources to their payments, and some, perhaps, will be fortunate enough to save themselves from loss, but it cannot generally be the case. The aggregate amount of produce shipped will not, at the present prices, pay cost and transportation; the probability, therefore, is, that all the exporters will be injured, and many ruined in their fortunes, and the country will be deprived of the money, which, in better times, would have been returned to purchase the produce of the current year.

The banks which have loaned money on the faith of these bills, aware of the danger of their dishonor, dare not discount now; they must, out of regard to their own safety, refuse their accustomed accommodation, and withdraw their issues. Hence their paper, as a medium, must be very greatly diminished. It is expected by some, that specie will flow in to supply its place; but it cannot be so. Specie, if procured at all, must be purchased with something, and something too that will command a price. It must be the balance which remains to our traders, after paying their bills of exchange, that they can shrink back in specie from New York or New Orleans; but, if their produce will not pay those bills, which, as an aggregate, I am apprehensive it will not, they will come back empty-handed, and in debt. The coming season, therefore, will bring us no new supply of specie.

There is another cause, that must operate unfortunately upon our currency for some time to come: Notes on the Bank of the United States cannot circulate with us at all; every dollar that gets into the hands of a merchant or a bank, is locked up and saved, until it can be sent, instead of a draft, to the Atlantic cities. By my last advice, the paper of that bank was selling at a premium of one per cent., and, commanding that price, it will be seen at once that it is impossible it should circulate as a currency. Hence, too, will be seen a reason, why the circulation of the notes of that bank constantly diminish, while their discounts remain nearly the same.

There is another cause, which must operate severely upon us in the West: The notes of all, or nearly all, the Eastern and Southern banks, have circulated freely and extensively among us; they have been familiarly known and implicitly credited; but this shock on credit has alarmed the people as to the safety of that paper. The Bank of Maryland has failed at a time when much of its paper was in credit and circulation in the West. Another failure, the Bank of Washington, is announced this morning, and others are probably at hand. It is universally known, or at least it is universally believed, that these failures arise from general causes, which affect alike the banks which are broken, and those which still sustain themselves. It is known, too, that when the credit of a bank begins to totter, the creditors near at hand save themselves by an immediate call at the counter for specie; while those at a distance, who hold their notes in small sums, bear the whole loss. Under these circumstances, the notes on the Eastern banks must cease to circulate in the Western country, and a vacuum will be created to the extent of the medium which they have heretofore supplied.

Such are the effects which the Executive experiment has produced, and is producing, in the West; and those which I have enumerated are some of the leading principles, or elements, which that experiment has called into action, and which tend to produce those effects. Our State and our people deal, and have been compelled to deal, upon borrowed capital: it is a new State—a young community; made up, not wholly, but largely, of active, enterprising men, but men without fortunes, and they have not had time, under the most favorable circumstances, as a people, to accumulate capital—that is the work of ages. They therefore, in extending their views, in expanding their enterprise to embrace as far as might be the riches which nature had so abundantly spread around them, in soil, in climate, and in mineral wealth, they necessarily became borrowers, and large borrowers; and hence the Executive denunciation against those who deal on borrowed capital falls with aggravated force on that community.

Mr. President, in the early part of the present session, when I first had the honor to address the Senate on the resolutions of my honorable friend from Kentucky, I spoke in anticipation of these evils, for I saw them just at hand, and I feared the infliction of others still more aggravated, which then threatened the State and the people which I represent, but which have happily passed by for the present, I trust never to return. Sir, I knew the State and the people could bear this evil, great as it is, and wantonly as it was inflicted, but I dreaded the remedy which certain politicians attempted to apply—a State bank more perfect in its organization as a political engine than the safety-fund system of New York, even as modified and improved by the six millions of State stock just created for the emergency. This was attempted to be fastened upon our people, but it would not do, and I am satisfied it never will do; the people of that State will, I am sure, never permit their farms to be mortgaged and their pockets drained to sustain any political bank, or political party, or any political experiment, by whomsoever it may be made.

It is true they have incorporated some local banks, but the people are not pledged for their solvency—and I think the legislature has thrown around them sufficient guards, to prevent them from acting on fictitious capital, and flooding the country with a baseless and unsound paper currency. But certainly no relief can be expected to the country from these new incorporations; the stock will not be subscribed in the present state of things; or, if it be, it must be drawn from the existing banks; consequently the new banks cannot add any new resources, to relieve the wants of the country, until the pressure shall be past, and business again revived.

As to the remedy proposed by the memorialists of the county of Hamilton, I concur generally in their views; there are some of the proposed modifications of the present bank charter or that of a new bank, if a re-charter of the present one be found impracticable, which to me are not without objections: but, if it were in my power to effect any thing for the relief of the nation, and especially of the State of Ohio, and of that city which is its emporium and its pride, I would yield much of my own opinions and wishes; I would pass by many faults in principle and detail, that the present ills which hang over us, and which press upon the people, might be averted. But all remedy, for the present, is hopeless, utterly, absolutely hopeless. Executive power and Executive influence are arrayed against them and us, and it is now an irresistible power, inexorable and blind as destiny. We can give no relief—the only remedy is in the hands of the people.

Mr. MORRIS said: I have not been honored, Mr. President, with a copy of the papers presented by my colleague, and, consequently, am unable to speak, with certainty, of the political character of the meeting held some time during the past winter, at the capital of our State. But if the information I have received be correct, it was not convened, as has been said, "without distinction of party." On the contrary, it was a meeting of a decided party character. I have resided in Ohio for nearly thirty years, and have some knowledge of the people of that State; and could I see the signatures affixed to the memorial, I would be able to judge if my colleague is correct in the broad remark, that it is signed "without distinction of party." The gentleman whom I understand to be the author of the resolutions, has long held a prominent place in the ranks of those opposed to the administration; and the fact that the meeting refused to hear a gentleman of high standing in opposition to the resolutions, and in favor of the measures of the administration, convinces me the meeting was convened by partisans, for party purposes. I also learn from the gentleman who represents that district in the other House, that the resolutions were not passed until a late hour in the day, and until a large number of the friends of the administration, who attended under the mild and peaceable call, "without distinction of party," had retired from the meeting.

The expressions of a meeting of this description ought not to be received as the political opinions of a great State. We ought rather to look at the course of policy pursued by her in past years—at the expression given in her public councils, and the vote of her citizens on this subject. And what, sir, are they? Decidedly adverse to the sentiments of this "no party meeting," whose organ was the willing instrument to effect a coalition between the nationals and anti-masons to defeat the election of the present Executive of Ohio. But this brotherly assistance failed—[Here Mr. EWING said he had presented no resolutions. It was a memorial. He knew nothing of the meeting the gentleman alluded to.

Mr. MORRIS asked his colleague to say if the memorial did not emanate from the meeting.

Mr. EWING answered, the memorial will show from whence it came.

The memorial was then read.]

Mr. MORRIS resumed. I find, sir, I was not mistaken in point of fact. The meeting convened in Franklin county, and this memorial is the result of its proceedings. I say again, it was a convocation of men bitterly opposed to the administration, whose proceedings were decidedly of a party character.

I view the memorial they have sent here, in the light I have looked upon others of a similar cast. It is a paper, sir, prepared for a special purpose—made according to order, as a sort of merchandise, suitable for a particular market, and sent here to be retailed in other parts of the country. It is a kind of political nostrum, the ingredients of which, if known in the country as well as they are here, would be rejected by the people as delusive and deceptive.

But, sir, the memorial does not complain of any immediate distress that followed the act of the Executive in removing the deposits—oh! no; it has not yet reached them—but they fear, almost to trembling, that it will. They already snuff it upon the tainted gale. This, too, seems to be the fears of my honorable colleague—but they are drawn too much from generalities to make an impression upon the mind, or enlighten the understanding. I would thank him to give the Senate some particular fact, upon which our judgments could be formed. What is the actual condition of the people of Ohio with regard to the present distress? What is the state of our money market? And what is the price of the products of the soil of Ohio? A correct understanding of these facts, would enable us to form something like a satisfactory opinion.

The gentleman says, that labor does not meet its accustomed reward, and confidence in our means is lost. To support this, he introduces the memorial and the proceedings of a meeting in Cincinnati. The meeting I notice at another time, and on a more proper occasion—but I will here remark, that, from all the information I have been able to obtain, and from my knowledge of the industry, economy, habits, trade, and wealth, of the people of Ohio, the very reverse of the remarks is the true state of the case. A single instance, which I will relate, ought to be a conclusive answer to all his imaginary fears. The legislature of Ohio, at its late session, created a number of local banks; one, among the number, was located in the village of Wooster, about seventy miles from Columbus, the stock of which was taken in a single day, and in about four hours after the books were opened, with an excess of twenty-five thousand dollars; and this, too, mostly by the citizens of the county where the bank is located. Does this look like a pressure in the money market, and a want of means in the people of Ohio to sustain themselves against the grasping power of the Bank of the United States? Why, sir, it at least shows, that we are not yet visited by the direful distress my colleague thinks awaits us. I also learn, from all the information I receive, that the products of our soil command a better average price than they have for some years past. It is true, there is a decrease in the price of the article of wheat; but all, conversant with the facts, know this is caused by a plentiful harvest throughout the whole country. But even this article is now rising in value, and will soon resume its accustomed price.

I have been looking for some time past for a cry of distress from Ohio; for I was well satisfied that orders to that effect had issued some time since; and, from a zeal worthy of a better cause, the memorial has at length arrived. It is to me a matter of no surprise or astonishment that four or five thousand people can be found in Ohio, who would be willing to express their fears at the present crisis; and I am only surprised that, after all the means that have been resorted to here, as well as in our own State, to obtain signatures to memorials of this description, a greater number have not been presented from the Western country. There, sir, we have an opposition to this administration as bitter, as able, and as persevering, as in any part of the country, and they lose no opportunity of showing it. I do not complain, or condemn them, for it is their right and privilege to do so. But, with all the means in their power; with the wealth of the country, in a great degree, in their hands, and claiming to possess all the intelligence, and sometimes all the decency of the State, what impression have they been able to make upon the great body of the people? Why, sir, none; literally none! With all their extensive business of panic-making, they have been unable to lessen the price of the common articles in our markets. I fear the great master has but few apt scholars in Ohio, or they have not understood their lesson. There they have produced but little or no effect; and I hope it will soon be abandoned by every friend of Western prosperity.

I think I can truly say, I do not believe there is any extraordinary pressure in Ohio. The great resources of the State, and the industry of her citizens, are amply sufficient to meet any emergency that may be brought upon them by the bank. They are not a people who sit and repine at fancied distress, which may possibly overtake them. When it comes, they will be able to meet it; for their strength is sufficient for the occasion.

But, sir, there is one pressure, of which Ohio, I think, justly complains, and is felt by nearly all her citizens. It is the pressure of bank documents, and speeches of honorable members in favor of that institution. The stages are heavily pressed, to the great injury of her roads; her village post offices are pressed almost to suffocation, and her industrious citizens are pressed to receive and read those documents, to enlighten and convince them that the bank ought to be the special object of their care. I trust my honorable colleague has no agency in this extraordinary and severe pressure of his constituents, although I have received hints to this effect from all parts of the State. But, sir, we will be able to survive even this shock, great as it is; for we have heretofore had some acquaintance with the bank, and do not need much more information to enable us to judge of its intrinsic merits.

No doubt there are many former friends of this administration who believe, and honestly too, that the bank is not only a constitutional, but a salutary institution, calculated to promote the interest, and necessary to the prosperity of the country. This seems to be the opinion of the meeting convened in Cincinnati on the 24th of February, an account of which I received, but not in the official form that would authorize me to present it to the Senate. The gentleman who presided at that meeting, I highly esteem; he is of undoubted standing in society, and perhaps is still a friend of the leading measures of the administration, although a friend to the bank. In the city of Cincinnati, I think it highly probable, there is a majority in favor of the institution. The meeting provided for the collection of signatures to the memorial which has been presented, and the result of their labors is now before us. This led to a general convention of the county to express an opinion on this question. The convention convened, and its expression was in direct opposition to the Cincinnati meeting. I have received a copy of their proceedings, and will take the first opportunity of laying them before the Senate. We will then see on which side the weight of public opinion is, and I will then, if indulged by the Senate, say something more on this subject. I will, however, here remark, that Hamilton county is one of the oldest and most respectable counties in the State, and her voice has uniformly been in opposition to the bank. Her population is about 60,000, and a memorial signed by 4,000 is presented as the sentiments of that county.

Mr. EWING said that the number was four thousand three hundred and ten.

Mr. MORRIS. Does this number constitute even a majority of the voters in the city? I think not, although I am willing to admit a majority of that city is opposed to the administration. I ought, however, to return my thanks to my colleague, that distress is not now upon us. "In fancy's eye he sees it coming," and conjures us to prepare and ward off the danger. For myself I have no fears. From the rapid progress it has made in other parts of the country, it ought now to be felt throughout all the State of Ohio; yet he thinks it has not yet reached us.

It is again asserted by my colleague that the prices of our marketable articles have so fallen, that a quantity that would, a short time since, have discharged a debt of $300 is now required to pay a debt of $200. Thus increasing the debt, or rather diminishing the value of the means of payment, fifty per cent. In this statement, I am again incredulous. A gentleman, very recently from Cincinnati, and now in this chamber, as well as information of a recent date from merchants in that neighborhood, inform me that the articles sold in that market bear a better average price than they have for some years past. If I am mistaken in all this, it is easy for my colleague to prove his position by stating some fact, from which it will appear that it requires one-third more of the farmer's products to pay a debt now than it did in years past. I imagine, sir, it is mere flummery, with few or no facts to support it; and I almost said it was mere cant, to produce political effect.

I also learn there is no extraordinary pressure in the money market of Ohio. It may be true there are not as many buildings being erected as formerly, but it is owing to the conduct of the branch bank in that city, which is trying to produce an effect, in order to make friends to the institution. But I deny it is owing to the general scarcity of money, and I am supported in my opinion, from the fact that the stock, in moneyed institutions lately incorporated in that city, are subscribed for with the usual avidity. If I am right in these particulars, the cry of distress from Ohio comes too late. It is "stale, flat, and unprofitable," and was hardly a sound article when put up for transportation. I, however, have no doubt the bank has done all in her power to embarrass the trade of Ohio, and the large curtailments in New Orleans were intended to affect Western interest. But the people there are beyond the power of the bank. They do not, and will not, rely on it as the only foundation of their hopes and prosperity. They are not a borrowing, but an industrious, independent people, although my colleague has said, if I understood aright, that Cincinnati has grown up on borrowed capital. This is an error, a great error, indeed. Is there no industry and enterprise in that country? Have we no resources without relying upon borrowed capital? Are we reduced to this state of dependence? I trust not; for I have been taught by superior wisdom to believe that a nation of borrowers are a nation of slaves; that the borrower is a servant of the lender. Are we in a condition that we cannot exist without the favor and facilities of the bank?

This, indeed, would place us in a state of slavery—willing, voluntary servitude, of the strongest kind; for we are more easily subdued when we think we owe a debt of gratitude for real or supposed favors. I have another authority, of a more recent date, to support this position. A member of the present Congress, not so wise as the one from whom I have quoted, but thought so by many, said that he who controlled a bank, controlled those indebted to the bank! If this be true, Ohio, according to my honorable colleague's opinion, is the slave of the bank! But I deny the dependence, and all acquainted with the fertility of our soil, the ample means within the power of every man living there to acquire for himself substantial capital, and sufficient wealth, will agree with me in opinion. Sustained by a borrowed capital indeed! It is not—it has not been so.

But my colleague has given in another alarming incident calculated to produce a great panic in Ohio! And what is it? The failure of the little Bank of Maryland! which, in his imagination, has produced consternation and dismay in the great and powerful State of Ohio! I have a better opinion of our State, and her immense resources; and, if a dozen such banks were to go down at once, it would produce no more effect in Ohio than a pebble thrown in the Potomac. It might create a wave for the moment, but it would instantly be lost in the immensity of the surrounding water. I have resided for a long time in Ohio, and I never saw a dollar on this bank until I visited this city. The gentleman has also expressed his fears that our own legislature would have created a political bank during its late session. In this, he is glad to find he was mistaken. I presume he alludes to a State bank. I too, rejoice that we sometimes bring to our recollection the proceedings of the body that elected us—it may be profitable for our instruction. But, in his opinion of a State bank, I am again compelled to differ with him, as well as many valued friends.

I have not been able to discover the policy of that system of banking that gives to a corporation, under the sanction of law, the power of creating a currency for the country, and that the power should be kept beyond the reach of the people, who are capable of constructing and organizing every department of the Government. Yet, this same people, through their constituted agents, are incapable of managing and controlling a bank. I was forcibly struck with the truth of the idea, advanced the other day by an honorable Senator from New York, that it seemed vitally essential to the prosperity of the people that they should keep banks, as well as every public institution in the country, under their own control; and I cannot see why the Government is not as competent to accomplish this object as any corporation it can create. I have ever been opposed to banking as a system, for I think it a bad one; if it must exist, we ought carefully to avoid placing in the hands of any individual or corporate company, the power possessed by the present Bank of the United States. If a banking institution must be created by the Government, we ought to retain the same influence over it that we do over all or any departments of the Government, and keep its very charter within the repealing power of the Government.

There is one idea which struck my mind with great force during the great debate on this subject, which I will briefly notice at this time. It is not denied that the bank has caused all the distress that is said to exist in the country, but it is justified on the ground that the President stands in an antagonist position to it—that its acts are necessary for self-preservation—that he has made war upon it, and it has been obliged to curtail its discounts as a necessary means of defence. Admitting all this to be true, it clearly convinces me the bank ought not to exist for a single hour beyond the expiration of its present charter. If it can exercise such tremendous power in its defence, it can exercise the same power, at its will, at any other period. If it can create all the distress complained of at one time, it can at another; and an institution of this description ought not to exist. Admit the present directors to be as perfect as men can be, still they are but men, and liable to abuse their power; for such is the nature of man where there is no accountability. Such is the situation of things now—the bank has caused its power to be severely felt, and it is contended that the directors are justifiable in the act. This power may soon pass into other hands, who may, without pretence or excuse, enact the same scenes. Had we not, then, better meet the crisis now? I ask my colleague if it would not be better for Ohio if an end were put to an institution whose very favors are the barbingers of death; and, like the gaudy trappings that sometimes adorn the ox when about to be led to the slaughter, intended to show the wealth and power of the owner, but an unerring insignia of its impending fate. Instead of providing them the means for their political inhumation, had we not better teach them, as far as we are able, to rely upon the bounties of Providence, and their own industry, for the means of support?

I have, Mr. President, made these remarks, because the observations of my colleague seemed to demand them. I will endeavor to express myself more fully when I present the proceedings of the Hamilton county convention, which I will do the first opportunity. I will then have occasion to declare my entire conviction of the unconstitutionality of the bank, and endeavor to show my objections are founded upon the nature and structure of our Government, and the total want of power in Congress to create a corporation, except within this District. This, however, is not a proper subject to be urged now; a more suitable occasion will soon offer for the discharge of the duty required of me, and which I so justly owe to the people of Ohio.

Mr. MANGUM rose for the purpose of making an inquiry of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. MORRIS.] He had learned to-day, for the first time, from that gentleman, that the borrower is a slave to the lender. Now, he wished to know whether the State of Ohio, who had borrowed for the purpose of carrying on her public works, a large proportion of foreign capital, was a slave, or rather whether her citizens were slaves, to those foreigners who loaned the money?

Mr. MORRIS replied, that he understood the gentleman from North Carolina, and would refer him to the authority from whence he derived his inference. He would not say that the gentleman was wiser than the one who made the observation: he had read that the borrower was the servant of the lender; but probably the Senator from North Carolina knew better, and he therefore would not dispute the point with him. He foresaw, at the time the canal fund was raised in Ohio, that some difficulties would result from it, and he dreaded this New York influence then as much as it was dreaded now by gentlemen on that floor. His objections were answered by saying there was no danger; that New York was a great and magnanimous State, and would always act liberally. It was said that she had borrowed all her capital for her magnificent public works, from her own citizens; therefore, he (Mr. M.) contended that Ohio ought to wait until her citizens were able to lend her the funds, before she embarked in public improvements. He would say one thing to the Senator from North Carolina, and that was, Ohio owed a debt of gratitude to New York, nothing else. She had made no compact with New York as to the terms on which her citizens and her products were to be admitted on the New York canals. Yet New York had magnanimously placed the citizens of Ohio on the same footing as her own. In this sense they were servants to New York, so far as a debt of gratitude went, and no farther. It had been said in the House of Representatives, that he who rules a bank rules all who are indebted to it.

Mr. EWING said, I am sorry to see my colleague attempt to array the political parties of our State on this floor, and marshal them under their leaders. Details of the kind which he is disposed to fall into, if correct, are a point of fact, which I believe is not the case, are in bad taste. They aid us very little in the legitimate business of legislation, and are inconsistent with the approved course of debate before this body. I shall join in no discussion of that kind here.

On the other hand, I should be gratified with certain information which he has just given us, if I could rely implicitly upon its correctness; but I am inclined to think here is some mistake in the matter. I cannot take his information, or that of the gentleman from Cincinnati, who is his informant, in opposition to the whole current of evidence which is constantly flowing in upon us, and which shows that the direct contrary is the fact. As to the motives which he has allowed himself to impute somewhere, for the representations which are made on his subject, I leave him to settle the matter with our common constituents—it is totally immaterial here what may be the state of facts between us—at home it will be known precisely; and I am well pleased that the issue is placed upon something which will be easily determined by the people, they having all the evidence before them.

I say, then, sir, on the authority of information which I cannot doubt, that the staple articles of our country do not command so good a price as they did six months ago, or at this time last year—that wheat has fallen 15 or 20 cents per bushel; flour in proportion. Whiskey, which is one of our staple articles, (we do not drink it ourselves, but send it down the Mississippi,) has fallen from 25 to 15 cents per gallon. Fat bullocks, of which there are now, or were very lately, more than ten thousand in the Scioto valley, fit for market, have fallen about one-third in price, and hardly find a purchaser. In years past, there was such competition among buyers, that graziers found it for their interest to set up their stock and sell it on their terms to the highest bidder. They are not troubled now to make choice of a purchaser, when they can find one. In short, sir, the fact of a great scarcity of money, and of the fall of the prices of all articles of commerce, is every where, and by every body, admitted. It has long been so by all who did not hope to produce effect by denying it; and I supposed that none now remained who would hazard their reputation by an assertion to the contrary. As to the subscriptions of stock spoken of by my colleague, I have heard that the stock in the Wooster bank was subscribed, but I do not think it can or will be paid up, so as to put the bank in operation until a favorable change of times. Indeed I do not think it would be wise to attempt it; for capital out of bank is, at this time, worth much more than it can be if invested in any new stock; and no new bank can now be put in operation, so as to bring any relief to the country, unless the capital which sets it in motion come from abroad. I think my colleague must be mistaken as to the sale of new bank stock in Cincinnati. I have heard of nothing of the kind, and it could hardly have taken place without being made public. He will, I trust, send home his allegations and opinions on these subjects. I will send mine, both as to the present and the future, and the people there can judge which is most near the truth.

I regretted to hear him declare that the borrower of money was a slave to the lender. Sir, the fact is not so. In ordinary times the borrower and lender stand upon the most perfect equality. The man who gets the interest is quite as much obliged as the man that gives it for the use of the money. The relationship is somewhat changed, it is true, when the currency of a country becomes, as ours is now, so deranged that there is more money wanted than the lender can supply, and the borrower is unable to meet the payment when it becomes due; then, indeed, though not a slave, he may be; and the honest borrower in our country now, is an injured, suffering man—ruined, perhaps, by the Government which ought to have protected him. But in common times, when the helm of state is held steady by skilful hands, there is a perfect reciprocity between the borrower and the lender. The man who has laid up money, cannot live upon its interest unless he lend it. The enterprising young man, without capital, must borrow. Both are benefited, and neither is degraded.

My colleague has, of course, the right to assume to himself any epithet, that of servant or slave, or whatever may please him; to this I have nothing to object; but I do object to the application of these terms of servility to the people of the State which we represent. That State owes the State of New York no allegiance, nor any debt, than that which is mutually due from commercial communities, who reciprocate in commercial exchanges. They want our trade, and we want theirs, and we are mutually accommodated, that is all.

The memorials were received, and ordered to be printed.

NUMBER OF PETITIONERS.

Mr. CLAY rose to present a motion or order, to which he invited the attention of the Senate. We have had, said he, a great variety of memorials and petitions presented in the progress of this session, on the state of the country, its distresses, and the relief which the petitioners think ought to be extended to the country. It appeared to him that the compilation of these papers would form a document one would like to possess, to see the aggregate number of petitioners, pro and con, on a most interesting subject, and to have a collected view of the sentiments of their fellow-citizens who had come before the Senate. With a view of ascertaining these particulars, he submitted the following order, which, as he supposed, did not require a delay on the table of one day, he hoped the Senate would consider at once:

Ordered, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to cause to be ascertained and reported to the Senate, the aggregate numbers of all who have, or shall have, on the day of his report, presented petitions, memorials, or other proceedings to the Senate, for or against the Executive measure of the removal of the public deposits, distinguishing the number appertaining to each.

The order having been read—

Mr. WRIGHT rose to inquire whether the rule did not require the order to lie on the table one day.

The CHAIR having replied in the negative,

Mr. WRIGHT said his object in rising was not to delay the consideration of the order; but he thought there were many reasons which would render the execution of such an order a matter not only of difficulty, but of delicacy to the Secretary. He would mention one single difficulty that had come under his own observation. During the last week, there had been received from the public printer two memorials from Albany, New York, printed with the names. The names had been printed on his motion. Now, when one of these memorials was presented, it was said to contain 2,812 names; but, on counting them, he found but 1,313. The number of names in the other memorial also differed in the printed copy from that the original was said to contain. He made these remarks with no invidious feelings. He did not attribute the mistake to the printer, or to any one else, but to show if the order was passed by the Senate, that it would be very difficult to execute it. For these reasons, he would prefer laying the order on the table.

Mr. CLAY said he was aware that absolute and entire precision was not to be obtained; but he thought an approximation was sufficient. Where there were 100,000 signatures, it was not to be expected but that there might be some fictitious ones among them, and the number of names stated to be affixed to memorials might also be misstated, being a few more or less; but this would be of little consequence. It would, however, be as well, if practicable, to put the Senate in possession of such information as would enable it to discriminate between those individuals in possession of the elective franchise, and those who had it not—between the fictitious and the real names. The name of the Presiding Officer of the Senate had been found affixed to the Baltimore memorial, and he (Mr. C.) knew not how many John Does and Richard

Roes; but notwithstanding all this, he was willing to take them altogether, for he wanted to see the real amount of the signatures—to get some near approximation; it was all that was requisite in a case like this.

With respect to what had been said by the honorable Senator from New York, in regard to the Albany memorial, he felt persuaded there was some mistake. If he understood the honorable Senator correctly, his list was greater than that of his opponents, and perhaps that had been done, though not by the honorable gentleman himself, but by some one else, who might have contrived to cut off the tail of our petition, in order to annex it to his. He (Mr. C.) would not say it had happened; but he had understood that a large number of the names that were attached to a petition which had been gotten up in Philadelphia by the glass manufacturers, for a purpose unconnected with this subject, had been cut off and affixed to a memorial addressed to the other House on the subject of the removal of the depositories.

As regarded the Albany memorial, it would become the duty of the Secretary of the Senate, and he (Mr. C.) had such confidence in him that he was sure that officer would examine how the matter stood. With respect to the gentlemen who had brought the memorial from Albany, he believed that what they had stated they thought to be perfectly true, that there were 2,800 and odd signatures. He had not seen the printed document to which the honorable Senator had referred, but he (Mr. C.) would venture to say, if there was not the number of names which had been stated, there had occurred some accident or mistake. He thought the document—though, he repeated, they might not get at the absolute fact—would be a valuable one, as furnishing something like the aggregate numbers, and would show the real state of the matter, pro and con. He had taken the opportunity of inquiring of one of the clerks in the office as to the practicability of obtaining this document, and he had assured him (Mr. C.) that it could be prepared in two or three days. It was a duty which could be accomplished without difficulty.

Mr. WRIGHT believed the Secretary would do him the justice to say that he had not seen the Albany memorial.

Mr. CLAY hoped the gentleman did not understand him as intending to make any such charge.

Mr. WRIGHT said that he perfectly understood the gentleman from Kentucky, and should say no more on that point. As to the fictitious or other unreal signatures, he had made no remark. But it was known that there had been large and respectable meetings in New York, and particularly in Philadelphia, in the first place as citizens, and then again in classes, as mechanics of various descriptions. Was it not probable that in these classifications the same persons were embraced who had met also and petitioned Congress in the character of citizens? He did not refer to one side of the question more than the other; but he asked whether, under such circumstances, a fair representation of numbers, either way, could be obtained? It was impossible, in this mode, to ascertain the true number with any kind of accuracy. Supposing, for example, the name of John Doe was to be found appended several times to a memorial, how would it be competent to the Secretary to ascertain whether these were written by different persons, or by a single individual? The statement, therefore, would not present any thing like an approximation, in the proper sense of the term. He had stated a case in which a petition from Albany had been presented, said to be signed by 2,800 names, while the same memorial on our files showed only about half that number of signatures. He would say that he placed entire confidence in the gentlemen composing the committee which had charge of this petition, and he did not believe that they would have presented there any thing which they themselves did not regard as true. But it was clear that there must have been some mistake somewhere; and he thought this order ought not to be issued, until that mistake should be explained.

He would ask, again, in reference to the meetings at Philadelphia, if it was intended to present in the enumeration those who had, in one instance, signed memorials as citizens, and then as mechanics or merchants? He did not intend any disrespect to any of the memorialists, when he thus showed that the statement now called for would be numerically inaccurate. The gentleman from Kentucky had said that the number of these signers exceeded a hundred thousand, and there was no doubt that he was the fact, if they were to take all the names which were appended to the memorials; because, in many instances, the same names would be found signed as mere citizens, without reference to their various trades and occupations; and then, on other memorials, in classes, according to their trades and occupations.

Mr. CLAY said, the honorable Senator had stated, most truly, that the subject was not free from difficulty in ascertaining either the number, the class, or the genuineness of the signatures. There was no greater difficulty in making the allowance which might be due in the aggregate, than in making the same allowances in detail. There might be a petition, for example, purporting to be signed by 4 or 5,000 persons—well, the number unquestionably would have a certain influence, but the aggregate number of signatures would have a much greater weight. The gentleman had disclaimed, with some feeling, the intimation made by him in respect to the way of signatures to the petition from Albany. I made no imputation. I feel no disposition to make any. I think the honorable member incapable of doing any thing dishonorable. But I must protest against his doctrine, that I have no right to look into the character of petitioners coming from his, or any other State. Most unquestionably, I have such right: nor did I make any imputation on the petitioners from the State of New York. My remarks had reference to petitions from a totally different quarter. If there be a solitary instance of a fraud intended to be committed on Congress, by multiplication, or duplication, or substitute of fictitious for real names, or any other process, on the side of those who oppose the Executive conduct, I am ignorant of it. In reference to the petitions from New York, it had been stated in the newspapers of that city, that George McDuffie, Duff Green, and other such names, were appended to the memorials. Every man could look at these names, and would make the proper deduction for accident, or mistake, or fraud.

He could not say what was the number of signers. He had conjectured that there might be 150,000 or 100,000 against the removal of the depositories. If any of these were improper signatures, every man could make his own deductions.

Mr. KING said, he was under the impression that it was not proper to act on the order at this time. All the memorials and papers to which the order referred, had been committed to, and were in possession of, the Committee on Finance. Some had been printed with the names, some without. But until the Committee on Finance reported on them, the Secretary could not get at them for the purpose of executing the order. At least until then, he could not get at the names in those memorials, where the names had not been printed. He thought it better not to act on the order until the committee reported; when the whole of the names would be in possession of the Secretary.

Mr. CLAY answered, if the honorable member would recollect the terms of intercourse on which the Secretary stood with the different committees of the Senate, he would perceive that that officer was permitted the free access to their papers. If the Secretary wanted to names of any memorial, the names of which had not been printed, the chairman of the finance committee would undoubtedly supply them. There was certainly no such difficulty in the way as the Senator from Alabama apprehended.

Mr. POINDEXTER moved to amend the motion by inserting the words "specifying the city, town, and county, from whence the memorials, resolutions, or other proceedings emanated."

Mr. P. said he had endeavored to obtain, as accurately as he could, the number of the petitioners for and against the removal of the public depositories. He believed the number to be somewhere about eighty thousand, probably over, when adding the names attached to the memorials that came in this morning. He should have been glad if the order could have been so extended as to direct the Secretary to continue the list to the end of the session.

Mr. CLAY having accepted Mr. POINDEXTER's amendment as a part of the motion—

Mr. SHEPLEY inquired whether the order was so worded as to distinguish each State, as there were towns of the same name in different States.

Mr. CLAY accepted this suggestion of Mr. SHEPLEY as a modification, and inserted the word State in the order—when

The question was taken, and the order was adopted.

PRINTING OLD JOURNALS.

Mr. POINDEXTER moved to take up for consideration the resolution offered by him a few days since, relative to the printing of the old Journals of Congress.

Mr. KING, of Georgia, objected to the consideration of the resolution at this time, in consequence of the absence of Mr. FORSYTH.

Mr. PRESTON said the honorable Senator from Georgia was mistaken with respect to the relation in which the other Senator from Georgia, [Mr. FORSYTH,] stood towards this resolution. It was to other printing that that Senator had objected, not to that which was alluded to in this resolution.

Mr. SOUTHARD said the resolution involved some inquiries which he was not at present prepared to answer—and he would therefore move that the subject be referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. KING said, that when he considered the heavy draws made upon the contingent fund of the Senate during the present session, he was sorry to see another resolution of this character pressed upon the consideration of the Senate. He said that probably the honorable Senator from Mississippi had not considered the expense of carrying the resolution into effect. It would, if he mistook not, cost from 30 to $40,000. But, he said, it was not alone this resolution at this particular time that he objected to, but to the whole system of printing and binding books for the individual use of the members.

Sir, said Mr. K., the abuses of the privilege of extra printing, as it is called, for the use of the members of the two Houses of Congress, which practically results in the purchase of libraries for the members, to be kept or even sold, as their private property, is very justly considered as one of the grievances of the nation, and a practice, he said, which the people would not much longer quietly submit to.

Why, (said Mr. K.,) as a part of the history of this abuse, allow me to refer to a vote of the other House a few days since, by which they passed a resolution that, according to the statement of one member, would cost the Government some $80,000; and this the House passed too, said he, with as little ceremony as they would vote the printing of a village memorial.

The House, he said, had been almost spasmodically contracted with economy at the beginning of the session, and refused at first to pass the appropriation bill, with a clause that allowed this privilege of printing books. But now they justified the practice in the House by the bad precedents of the Senate, and seemed determined to run with it a race of prodigality. The Senate, he said, had already passed one resolution during the session, that was said would cost $46,000; some other purchases had been also made, besides an unusual quantity of extra printing, and if this resolution passed, we should see at the next session the startling item of $150,000 for the contingent expenses of the Senate.

Sir, said Mr. K., it is not only an abuse, but an excess of power. The constitution provides that no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but by an appropriation made by law. If it should be said that the cost of books might be, and usually was smothered up in the appropriation bill for contingent expenses of the Senate, he could only say in answer, that this would be a fraudulent concealment of the object, which object was itself unconstitutional.

The pay of members, he said, by one clause of the constitution, was to be fixed by law. It was fixed by law at eight dollars per day; but by this practice, by the receipt of their money, and the sale of their books, they were likely to double it, as in point of fact the members frequently never received into their possession a volume of the works given them by Congress to qualify them for the performance of their duties; but sold them to booksellers, and gave orders for them on the officers of the House. Not expecting the Government to give him a library, he said, and being determined that it should not, if he could help it, he had negotiated for the purchase of a work which Congress had voted to the members at the last session, at a cost to the Government of $55,000. The bookseller, he said, offered him an order on the clerk for a copy, which he had purchased from a member. [Here Mr. CLAY asked for the name of the member who sold it.] Mr. K. answered, that if he was rightly informed, the practice was common, and too general to justify any particular exposure. He said, however, if he thought it of any consequence to the argument, he would make the disclosure, but it was of no consequence whether they kept the books as a valuable property of their own, or sold them and received their value in money. In fact, he said, if Congress gave members the books with the "jus disponendum," he did not see that we had any further concern with them; and they might make, without any impropriety, the same disposition of them that they made of their other property, especially after their term of service expired. Where is the difference, said Mr. K., whether they sold them or kept them as their own? Constitutions, he said, were not made to guard against what men probably will do, but what they may do. But if gentlemen thought it important to know that sales had actually been made, he could refer them to a notorious instance of a former member of this body, (about which there was no concealment,) having sold the books given to him during a single term of service to a foreign minister for $900!

The only power, he said, which Congress had on the subject, was to print for the use of the members as an official body, and then only to print and furnish official facts, for the information of the members whilst in the performance of their duties. But he denied the power to reprint and bind books of authority and history, either to enrich the libraries of the members or to enlighten the country. Where is the practice to stop? said Mr. K. If we can print and furnish one book because it is useful to the politician, why not reprint any other? Why not reprint some of the books of Livy, Gibbon's Decline and Fall, and all the useful books on history, politics, and political economy? For those books, he said, were all used by politicians, especially at home, much more than the books which it was now proposed to furnish, and much more than the books generally reprinted by Congress, and distributed among the members. The work, he said, which it is now proposed to print, at such an enormous expense, had been once reprinted by Congress already, and was a work on which no member who had it, he believed, placed much value as a library book. He had known one copy given away by a member as an encumbrance to his shelves. And no work could be more worthless, except to members whilst here, and they can refer to the eight or ten copies which are now in the library, and scarcely once touched, he would venture to say, during a whole session.

SENATE.]

Printing Old Journals.

Look farther, said Mr. K., at the practical inequality of the system. It depends on members themselves how much they will waste of the treasury of the nation in this way. The House and the Senate seem now trying who shall get the most books. Look again how the system fails in its object, even where the members keep their books. His honorable predecessor, he said, (no doubt against his wish,) had voted to him last session, books that cost the Government some hundreds of dollars, just one volume of which he received whilst he was a member, but which are to be sent hence to him by the Secretary to qualify him for the duties of a seat he has long since resigned; and I, (said Mr. K.,) who fill the seat, am without the books, and intend to remain so, unless I choose to purchase them with my own funds. Books, he said, which were sent home to members who had resigned, or whose time expired before the books were completed, and also such as were sold to booksellers, or carried by the purchasers to Europe, were, he supposed, "enlightening the members for the performance of their duties and spreading useful information among the people." But, sir, said Mr. K., it is of no consequence what they do with them, if they are allowed to carry them off as their own; the reasons given for the practice are mere evasions. Congress has no power to enlighten the people, or school their members in this way. Let us, he said, when necessary, print useful official documents for the use of the office, and not buy or make books for the officer. If the rule were adopted, he said that works printed by Congress were to be left in the Capitol, under control of the public officers, for the use of members for the time being, we should at least get rid of purchasing the same books from year to year, at a progressively increasing expense "to put new members on a footing with the old"—the plan lately adopted by the House. In fact, he said, with this rule we should soon get rid of the abuse altogether, as the argument of "spreading useful information," &c. he apprehended, would be much weakened with many gentlemen, when they knew they were only to use the books whilst in the service of the country. In fine, he said, this practice was one of the grossest abuses, as well as one of the most palpable usurpations that ever had crept into the legislative branch of the Government, and he thought it due to the character of the two Houses, that whilst they were daily charging usurpation and abuse upon one department of the Government, that they should cast an eye to their own department. They should first sweep out their own chambers before they complained too harshly of the disorders elsewhere. He concluded by moving that the resolution lie on the table for the balance of the session.

Mr. PRESTON having asked whether the resolution was so worded as to give the books to the members—

Mr. KING said the resolution was in the usual form, he believed—that was, to place the books at the disposal of the Senate; and the constant practice was, to first supply the members; but he did not know, nor could he imagine, what was to be done with the balance of the one thousand copies.

Mr. EWING having supported the principle of printing and buying books for the use of members, &c., and contending that Congress had the implied power on the same principle that they had power to build the Capitol, &c.

Mr. KING said he did not deny the power to print for the use of members in their official character, as he had already explained; and he thought the course a hopeless one, that invoked the aid of an analogy so unfortunate. Sir, said Mr. K., I understand that this Capitol, being built at the public expense, is for the use of the members of Congress and other officers, for the time being; and when the honorable Senator should be able to prove that the members had the power to vote the Capitol to be their own property, and sell it if they chose, and put the proceeds in their pockets, the analogy would bear him out, and not before. Mr. K. went on to answer more fully the arguments of Mr. E. and to enforce his views, and concluded by renewing his motion.

Mr. POINDEXTER had never before heard the statement made by the honorable Senator from Georgia, of members of the other House having sold their books. Such an abuse of the privilege given to members was certainly reprehensible, and he did not know the name of any one who had been guilty of such a practice. The power seemed to him to rest in the general discretion of Congress.

The power to raise money was limited by the constitution; but the power to appropriate was not so limited. Whence was the power to build the Capitol? It resulted from the constitution of the Government, that they had the right so to appropriate the public money, to carry on the Government, and to furnish members of Congress with every document essential to the performance of their duties. The object of the resolution, was the diffusion of the old Journals of Congress through the States, and to supply the Executive of each State with copies. So far as it respected the Senate, at the present crisis, when its very existence was threatened, when it was already assailed and denounced, it was important that the people should be in possession of the proceedings of the Senate as recorded in their Journals, that they might see how it had conducted. The copies when printed, would be at the disposal of the Senate, and they might distribute them as they should think best. They were now out of print, and a single copy was not to be had.

Mr. P. read from the Journals of Congress several instances in which the old Journals had been printed under the same circumstances. He said, they were not intended for the use of the Senate, but for sending throughout the country; and whether they should confer that benefit on the people, the Senate might judge. With respect to the printing ordered at the present session, the Senate could not dispense with it; they were public laws and documents, the basis on which facts rested. Three volumes had been already printed, and in bringing forward the resolution, it was estimated that the cost would not exceed $18,000. But let the cost be what it might, the documents were indispensable, and that they should be combined and printed in volumes. In the present case the cost could not be great, and it was important at this time that the people should be informed of the action of this department of the Government, from its commencement.

Mr. PORTER asked if the books were to be given to members?

Mr. KING said the proposition was in the usual form; he supposed a number of copies would be distributed here, and the rest throughout the country.

Mr. PORTER approved of the course recommended by the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. SOUTHARD,] and thought the subject ought to be referred to a committee. He, Mr. P., wished to know more about it; at present he could not say whether he should vote for the printing or not.

Printing Old Journals.—New York Memorials.

[SENATE.]

Mr. POINDEXTER did not think the subject could be referred. The present was a proposition for the action of the Senate alone. He had no objection, however, to the reference if it could be made.

Mr. BIBB said he was as much averse to voting books to himself as the honorable Senator from Georgia could be, and he had never given his vote to a proposition that would have that effect. He meant, however, to vote for the present resolution, and to assist in distributing the books proposed to be printed. He thought such a distribution would be highly useful. Whatever the Senator from Georgia might think of the work in question, he, Mr. B., must be permitted to say that he knew but of one other political book which could compare with it in value. That book was Sidney on Government; it was the best book he had ever read. Yet he could carry his mind to a gentleman who had approved of that decision of the British Government which condemned Sidney to death for high treason, for having written against the divine right of kings, against passive obedience and non-resistance. Now if the gentleman who had approved of the decision against Sidney were on the floor of the Senate, he, Mr. B., had no doubt he would say that Sidney's work was "trash;" that it was not "worth a cent," and that it ought to be burned! He, Mr. B., begged to tell the Senator from Georgia, that he thought the work proposed to be printed a very important one. It contained much of the history of our country; of our revolution; embodied the principles, and recorded the votes of the sturdiest patriots that ever resisted tyranny and oppression. There were men who looked upon these patriots as the vilest rebels; such persons would doubtless be opposed to the perpetuating of the history of our struggles for independence.

Was it unconstitutional for the old Congress to publish these Journals? The representatives of that period did it to give information to their constituents of what they had been doing, to show to after generations what they had done. If these Journals were distributed and read through by the young men of this country, many false views would be corrected and a better idea obtained of solid government, and what liberty really consists in, than was at present possessed. Next to Sidney on Government, he repeated that these Journals of the old Congress were the most valuable books he knew of; and he would ask if these Journals were published by the old Congress, had not the present Congress a right to do the same? If the old Congress too only published as many copies as their funds would permit, and as were rendered necessary by the then limited population, did not common sense teach that, now that the people of this country had grown in numbers, and had spread over a wider surface, a greater amount of copies was required? Nothing was proposed to be printed but what belonged to the history of the Government, of the old Confederation, the old Senate, and during the time that he had had a seat on that floor, from the year 1810 to 1814, he had read, day after day, and night after night, the Journals of the old Congress, with the greatest profit and advantage.

Mr. B. was understood to say, that he should not vote for the presentation of the work to members, but he did hope that the work would be put to press, that a copy would be sent to the Executive of each State, and that an additional number of copies would be printed for sale. He, for one, was willing to purchase the work. He was of opinion, that the true meaning of that part of the constitution which directed the printing of the public Journals, was, that they should be printed for distribution, not merely to lie on the table of the Senate. By distributing the Journals, the constituent saw what his representative had been doing, and thus was secured that valuable check which belonged to every republican nation. He would ask one question. Suppose they published a certain number of copies. Could they believe that these copies would be sufficient for the people of this country twenty years hence?

Undoubtedly if our legislatures did their duty, it would be their duty to print new editions from time to time, according as necessity might require them. He was certain that the honorable Senator from Georgia would do him the credit to believe him, that not one of the appropriations for which he had voted was for books to himself, especially if such a practice prevailed. Mention had been made of certain documents which were sold by an individual to a British minister. He understood that the documents so sold were not of one year, but a series of documents. The gentleman who sold them also was extremely unwilling to part with them, and would not have done it, had it not been for that which knows no law—sheer necessity. He might have said with the apothecary in Romeo and Juliet—

"My poverty and not my will consents."

He was sorry that that fact had been mentioned on the floor of the Senate. He had hoped, that considering the circumstances, and the necessity by which the gentleman was compelled to make the sale, charity would have induced gentlemen to draw the veil of oblivion over the transaction.

Mr. KANE disapproved of the whole practice, and moved that the resolution be laid indefinitely on the table.

Mr. MORRIS moved that the Senate do now adjourn. And, after a few remarks from Mr. POINDEXTER, and Mr. KING of Georgia,

The Senate adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, APRIL 14.

NEW YORK MEMORIALS.

Mr. CLAY presented two memorials, numerously signed: one from the city of Troy, the other from the city of Schenectady, New York, remonstrating against the removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States, and praying for their restoration, with the recharter of the bank.

On presenting the above proceedings—

Mr. CLAY said he was charged with the pleasing duty of presenting to the Senate the proceedings of a public meeting of the people, and two memorials, subscribed by large numbers of his fellow-citizens, in respect to the existing state of public affairs.

The first he would offer were the resolutions of the young men of Troy, assembled upon a call of upwards of seven hundred of their number. He had recently visited that interesting city. It is (said he) one of the most beautiful of a succession of fine cities and villages that decorate the borders of one of the noblest rivers of our country. In spite of the shade cast upon it by its ancient and venerable sister and neighbor, it has sprung up with astonishing rapidity. When he saw it last fall, he never beheld a more respectable, active, enterprising, and intelligent business community. Every branch of employment was flourishing. Every heart beat high in satisfaction with present enjoyment, and in hope from the prospect of future success. How sadly had the scene changed! How terribly have all their anticipations of continued and increasing prosperity been dashed and disappointed by the folly and wickedness of misguided rulers!

The young men advert to this change, in their resolutions, and to its true cause. They denounce all experiments upon their happiness. They call for the safer councils which prevailed under the auspices of Washington and Madison, both of whom gave their approbation to charters of a bank of the United States.

But what gives to these resolutions peculiar interest, in his estimation, is, that they exhibit a tone of feeling which rises far above any loss of property, however great, any distress from the stagnation of business, however intense. They manifest a deep and patriotic sensibility to Executive usurpations, and to the consequent danger to civil liberty. They solemnly protest against the union of the purse and the sword in the hands of one man. They would not have consented to such a union in the person of the Father of his Country, much less will they in that of any living man. They feel that, when liberty is safe, the loss of fortune and property is comparatively nothing; but that when liberty is sacrificed, existence has lost all its charms.

The next document which he had to offer was a memorial, signed by near nine hundred mechanics of the city of Troy. Several of them were personally known to him. And judging from what he knew, saw, and heard, he believed there was not any where a more skillful, industrious, and respectable body of mechanics than in Troy. They bear testimony to the prevalence of distress, trace it to the illegal acts of the Executive branch of the Government in the removal of the public deposits; ask their restoration, and the re-charter of the Bank of the United States. And the committee, in their letter addressed to him, say: "We are, what we profess to be, working men, dependent upon our labor for our daily bread, confine our attention to our several vocations, and trust in God and the continental Congress for such protection as will enable us to operate successfully."

The first-mentioned depository of their confidence will not deceive them. But I lament to say that the experience, during this session, does not authorize us to anticipate that co-operation in another quarter which is indispensable to the restoration of the constitution and laws, and the recovery of the public purse.

The last memorial he would present, had been transmitted to him by the secretaries of a meeting stated to be the largest ever held in the county of Schenectady, in New York. It is signed by about eight hundred persons. In a few instances, owing to the subscriptions having been obtained by different individuals, the same name occurs twice. The memorialists bring their testimony to the existence of distress, and the disorders of the currency, and invoke the application of the only known, tried, and certain remedy, the establishment of a national bank.

And now, Mr. President, (continued Mr. C.,) I will avail myself of the occasion to say a few words on the subject-matter of these proceedings and memorials, and on the state of the country as we found it at the commencement of the session, and its present state.

When we met, we found the Executive in the full possession of the public Treasury. All its barriers had been broken down, and in place of the control of the law was substituted the uncontrolled will of the Chief Magistrate. I say uncontrolled: for it is idle to pretend that the Executive has not unrestrained access to the public Treasury, when every officer connected with it is bound to obey his paramount will. It is not the form of keeping the accounts; it is not the place alone where the public money is kept; but it is the power, the authority, the responsibility of independent officers, checking and checked by each other, that constitute the public security for the safety of the public treasure. This no longer exists, is gone, is annihilated.

The Secretary sent us in a report containing the reasons (if they can be dignified with that appellation) for the Executive seizure of the public purse. Resolutions were promptly offered in this body, denouncing the procedure as unconstitutional and dangerous to liberty, and declaring the total insufficiency of the reasons. Near three months were consumed in the discussion of them. In the early part of this protracted debate, the supporters of the Executive measure stoutly denied the existence of distress, pronounced it a panic got up for dramatic effect, and affirmed that the country was enjoying great prosperity. Instances occurred of members asserting that the place of their own residence was in the full enjoyment of enviable and unexampled prosperity, when, in the progress of the debate, were compelled reluctantly to own their mistake, and to admit the existence of deep and intense distress. Memorial after memorial poured in, committee after committee repaired to the Capitol to represent the sufferings of the people, until incredulity itself stood rebuked and abashed. Then it was the bank that had inflicted the calamity upon the country—that bank which was to be brought under the feet of the Executive, and which it was necessary, at all events, in the opinion of the President, should proceed forthwith to wind up its affairs.

And, during the debate, it was again and again pronounced by the partisans of the Executive, that the question involved in the resolutions was bank or no bank. It was in vain that we protested, solemnly protested, that that was not the question; and that the true question was of immensely higher import; that it comprehended the inviolability of the constitution, the supremacy of the laws, and the union of the purse and the sword in the hands of one man. In vain did members repeatedly rise in their places, and proclaim their intention to vote for the restoration of the deposits, and their settled determination to vote against the re-charter of the bank, and against the charter of any bank. Gentlemen persisted in asserting the identity of the bank question, and that contained in the resolutions; and thousands of the people of the country are, to this moment, deluded by the erroneous belief in that identity.

Mr. President, the arts of power and its minions are the same in all countries and in all ages. It marks a victim; denounces it; and excites the public odium and the public hatred, to conceal its own abuses and encroachments. It avails itself of the prejudices and the passions of the people, silently and secretly to forge chains to enslave the people.

Well, sir, during the continuance of the debate, we have been told over and over again, that, let the question of the deposits be settled, let Congress pass upon the report of the Secretary, and the activity of business and the prosperity of the country will again speedily revive. The Senate has passed upon the resolutions, and has done its duty to the country, to the constitution, and to its conscience.

And the report of the Secretary has been also passed upon in the other House; but how passed upon? The official relations which exist between the two Houses, and the expediency of preserving good feelings and harmony between them, forbid my saying all that I feel on this momentous subject. But I must say, that the House, by the constitution, is deemed the especial guardian of the rights and the interests of the people; and, above all, the guardians of the people's money in the public Treasury. The House has given the question of the sufficiency of the Secretary's reasons the go-by, evaded it, shunned it, or rather merged it in the previous question. The House of Representatives has not ventured to approve the Secretary's reasons. It cannot approve them, but, avoiding the true and original question, has gone off upon a subordinate and collateral point. It has indirectly sanctioned the Executive usurpation. It has virtually abandoned its constitutional care and control over the public Treasury. It has surrendered the keys, or rather permits the Executive to retain their custody; and thus acquiesces in that conjunction of the sword and the purse of the nation, which all experience has evinced, and all patriots have believed, to be fatal to the continuance of public liberty.

Such has been the extraordinary disposition of this great question. Has the promised relief come? In one short week after the House pronounced its singular decision, three banks in this District of Columbia have toppled payment and exploded. In one of them the Government has, we understand, sustained a loss of thirty thousand dollars. And in another, almost within a stone's throw of the Capitol, that navy pension fund, created for our infirm and disabled, but gallant tars, which ought to be held sacred, has experienced an abstraction of $20,000! Such is the realization of the prediction of relief made by the supporters of the Executive.

And what is the actual state of the public Treasury? The President, not satisfied with the seizure of it, more than two months before the commencement of the session, appointed a second Secretary of the Treasury since the adjournment of the last Congress. We are now in the fifth month of the session; and in defiance of the sense of the country, and in contempt of the participation of the Senate in the appointing power, the President has not yet deigned to submit the nomination of his Secretary to the consideration of the Senate. Sir, I have not looked into the record, but, from the habitual practice of every previous President, from the deference and respect which they all maintained towards a co-ordinate branch of the Government, I venture to say that a parallel case is not to be found.

Mr. President, it is a question of the highest importance what is to be the issue, what the remedy, of the existing evils. We should deal with the people openly, frankly, sincerely. The Senate stands ready to do whatever is incumbent upon it; but unless the majority in the House will relent; unless it will take heed of and profit by recent events, there is no hope for the nation from the joint action of the two Houses of Congress at this session. Still, I would say to my countrymen, Do not despair. You are a young, brave, intelligent, as yet a free people. A complete remedy for all that you suffer, and all that you dread, is in your own hands. And the events, to which I have just alluded, demonstrate that those of us have not been deceived who have always relied upon the virtue, the capacity, and the intelligence of the people.

I congratulate you, Mr. President, and I hope you will receive the congratulation with the same heartfelt cordiality with which I tender it, upon the issue of the late election in the city of New York. I hope it will excite a patriotic glow in your bosom. I congratulate the Senate, the country, the city of New York, the friends of liberty every where. It was a great victory. It must be so regarded in every aspect. From a majority of more than six thousand, which the dominant party boasted a few months ago, if it retain any, it is a meager and spurious majority of less than two hundred. And the Whigs contended with such odds against them. A triple alliance of State placemen, corporation placemen, and Federal placemen, amounting to about thirty-five hundred, and deriving, in the form of salaries, compensations, and allowances, ordinary and extra, from the public chests, the enormous sum, annually, of near one million of dollars. Marshalled, drilled, disciplined, commanded. The struggle was tremendous; but what can withstand the irresistible power of the votaries of truth, liberty, and their country? It was an immortal triumph—a triumph of the constitution and the laws over usurpation here, and over clubs and bludgeons and violence there.

Go on, noble city! Go on, patriotic whigs! Follow up our glorious commencement, persevere, and pause not until you have regenerated and disenthralled your splendid city, and placed it at the head of American cities devoted to civil liberty, as it now stands pre-eminently the first as the commercial emporium of our common country! Merchants, mechanics, traders, laborers, never cease to recollect that, without freedom, you can have no commerce or business; and that without law you have no security for personal liberty, property, or even existence! Countrymen of Tone, of Emmet, of Macneven, and of Sampson, if any of you have been deceived, and seduced into the support of a cause dangerous to American liberty, hasten to review and correct your course! Do not forget that you abandoned the green fields of your native island to escape what you believed the tyranny of a British king! Do not, I adjure you, lend yourselves, in this land of your asylum, this last retreat of the freedom of man, to the establishment here, for you, and for us all, of that despotism which you had proudly hoped had been left behind you, in Europe, forever! There is much, I would fain believe, in the constitutional forms of government; but at last it is its parental and beneficent operation that must fix its character. A government may in form be free, in practice tyrannical; as it may in form be despotic, and in practice liberal and free.

It was a brilliant and signal triumph of the whigs. And they have assumed for themselves, and bestowed on their opponents, a denomination which, according to all the analogy of history, is strictly correct. It deserves to be extended throughout the whole country. What was the origin, among our British ancestors, of those appellations? The tories were the supporters of Executive power, of royal prerogative, of the maxim that the king could do no wrong, of the detestable doctrines of passive obedience and non-resistance. The whigs were the champions of liberty, the friends of the people, and the defenders of the power of their representatives in the House of Commons.

During our revolutionary war, the tories took sides with executive power and prerogative, and with the king, against liberty and independence. And the whigs, true to their principles, contended against royal executive power, and for freedom and independence.

And what is the present but the same contest in another form? The partisans of the present Executive sustain his power in the most boundless extent. They claim for him all Executive authority. They make his sole will the governing power. Every officer concerned in the administration, from the highest to the lowest, is to conform to his mandates. Even the public Treasury, hitherto regarded as sacred and beyond his reach, is placed by them under his entire direction and control. The whigs of the present day are opposing Executive encroachments, and a most alarming extension of Executive power and prerogative. They are ferreting out the abuses and corruptions of an administration, under a Chief Magistrate who is endeavoring to concentrate in his own person the whole powers of Government. They are contending for the rights of the people, for civil liberty, for free institutions, for the supremacy of the constitution and the laws. The contest is an arduous one; but, although the struggle may be yet awhile prolonged, by the blessing of God and the spirit of our ancestors, the issue cannot be doubtful.

The Senate stands in the breach, ready to defend the constitution and to relieve the distresses of the people. But, without the concurrence of another branch of Congress, which ought to be the first to yield it, the Senate alone can send forth no act of legislation. Unaided, it can do no positive good; but it has vast preventive powers. It may avert and arrest evil, if it cannot rebuke usurpation. Senators, let us remain steadily by the constitution and the country, in this most portentous crisis: let us oppose to all encroachments and to all corruption, a manly, a resolute, and uncompromising resistance; let us adopt two rules from which we will never deviate, in deliberating upon all nominations. In the first place, to preserve untarnished and unsuspected the purity of Congress, let us negative the nomination of every member for any office, high or low, foreign or domestic, until the authority of the constitution and laws is fully restored.

SENATE.]

New York Memorials.—Salem (Mass.) Proceedings.—Death of Mr. Dennis.

[APRIL 15, 1834.]

I know not that there is any member of either House capable of being influenced by the prospect of advancement or promotion; I would be the last to make such an insinuation; but suspicion is abroad, and it is best, in these times of trouble and revolution, to defend the integrity of the body against all possible imputations. For one, whatever others may do, I here deliberately avow my settled determination, whilst I retain a seat in this chamber, to act in conformity to that rule. In pursuing it, we but act in consonance with a principle proclaimed by the present Chief Magistrate himself when out of power. But, alas! how little has he respected it in power! How little has he, in office, conformed to any of the principles which he announced when out of office! And, in the next place, let us approve of the original nomination of no notorious brawling partisan and electioneerer; but, especially, of the re-appointment of no officer presented to us, who shall have prostituted the influence of his office to partisan and electioneering purposes. Every incumbent has a clear right to exercise the elective franchise. I would be the last to controvert or deny it. But he has no right to employ the influence of his office, to exercise an agency which he holds in trust for the people, to promote his own selfish or party purposes. Here, also, we have the authority of the present Chief Magistrate for this rule; and the authority of Mr. Jefferson. The Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. GAUNDY,] merits lasting praise for his open and manly condemnation of these practices of official incumbents. He was right, when he declared his suspicion and distrust of the purity of the motives of any officer whom he saw busily interfering in the elections of the people.

Senators! we have a highly responsible and arduous position; but the people are with us, and the path of duty lies clearly marked before us. Let us be firm, persevering, and unmoved. Let us perform our duty in a manner worthy of our ancestors—worthy of American Senators—worthy of the dignity of the sovereign States that we represent—above all, worthy of the name of American freemen! Let us “pledge our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor,” to rescue our beloved country from all impending dangers. And, amidst the general gloom and darkness which prevail, let us continue to present one unextinguished light, steadily burning in the cause of the people, of the constitution, and of civil liberty.

Mr. C. concluded, by moving that the papers be read, printed, and referred to the Committee on Finance; which was agreed to.

SALEM (MASS.) PROCEEDINGS.

Mr. SILSBEE presented the proceedings and resolutions of a public meeting, held in the town of Salem, Massachusetts, approving the conduct of the Executive in relation to the Bank of the United States; which, having been read,

Mr. SPRAGUE inquired what was the number of persons who constituted the meeting? The resolutions, he said, were of an extraordinary character. One of them expressed doubts as to the correctness of the report of what passed between the President and the committees who waited on him with memorials on the subject of the deposits. He should like, therefore, to know the number of the persons who passed the resolutions.

Mr. SILSBEE replied, that he could not answer that question, having received no information on that subject. The resolutions were sent to him by a committee of five—but whether these five composed the whole meeting, or whether it was attended by five thousand, he did not know.

Mr. SPRAGUE said he should like to know whether there were more than these five persons who attended the meeting. In the absence, however, of this information, which his friend from Massachusetts could not afford him, he desired to express his belief in the correctness of the report of the conversations between the President and the committees, alluded to in the resolutions. With many of the Philadelphia committee he was personally acquainted, and he was confident they were incapable of misrepresenting their conversation with the President. The proceedings were then referred, and ordered to be printed.

After taking up and disposing of several bills, among which the bill authorizing the relinquishment of the 16th sections of public lands, granted for the use of schools, and the location of other lands in lieu thereof, was, after a debate, laid on the table, on motion of Mr. CLAY, by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Ewing, Frilinghuysen, Kent, King of Georgia, Knight, Leigh, Mr. Gum, Naudain, Prentiss, Robbins, Silsbee, Smith, Sostard, Sprague, Swift, Tomlinson, Wilkins.—20.

NAYS.—Messrs. Benton, Black, Grundy, Hendrick Hill, Kane, Linn, Moore, Morris, Porter, Robinson, Seyley, Tallmadge, Tipton, White.—16.

The Senate adjourned.

DEATH OF Mr. DENNIS.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Walter S. Franklin, Esq., their Clerk, notifying the Senate of the death of the Hon. LITTLETON PEARCE DENNIS, late a member of that House, from the State of Maryland, and that his funeral would take place from the Hall of the House of Representatives, to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

The message having been read—

Mr. KENT rose and said: Mr. President: The message which has just been read, announces to you, and to the Senate, the death of the late Mr. DENNIS, one of the Representatives from the State of Maryland, of the other branch of Congress. Already, Mr. President, our feelings have been repeatedly agonized by the sudden death of several of our associates, in the legislative labors of the session, and the one that has just been made known to us is little less sudden than those that have preceded it.

But a few days since, and the deceased was busily engaged in the attentive discharge of the duties of his station, and he is now numbered with the dead. He is gone to “that bourn from whence no traveller returns.” Truly has it been said, “in the midst of life we are a death.” The deceased was a native of Somerset county, in Maryland, a prominent member of a highly respectable family, in the 50th year of his age, and although of a delicate constitution, was justifiable in looking forward yet to many years of usefulness and happiness. He was a member of the bar, justly esteemed in his profession, and always in possession of the confidence of his countrymen. His modest, unassuming, and retiring habits, could not conceal from them his good sense and high attainments, and early in life he was returned a delegate to the General Assembly of Maryland, and has been continued in the discharge of his legislative labors, with but little interruption, to the period of his decease.

Mr. KENT then submitted the following resolution, which was unanimously adopted:

Resolved unanimously, That the Senate will attend the funeral of the Hon. LITTLETON P. DENNIS, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Maryland, at the hour of 12 o'clock to-morrow; and as a testimony of respect for the memory of the deceased, they will go into mourning by wearing crape round the left arm for thirty days.

On motion of Mr. KENT, The Senate then adjourned.

President's Protest.

[SENATE.]

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 16.

No business was done in the Senate to-day, the Senate being engaged in attending the funeral obsequies of the late Mr. DENNIS, a member of the House of Representatives.

THURSDAY, APRIL 17.

Several messages were received from the President of the United States, by Mr Donelson, his private Secretary; among them the following PROTEST.

To the Senate of the United States:

It appears by the published Journal of the Senate, that, on the 26th of December last, a resolution was offered by a member of the Senate, which, after a protracted debate, was, on the 28th day of March last, modified by the mover, and passed by the votes of twenty-six Senators, out of forty-six who were present and voted, in the following words, viz.

"Resolved, That the President, in the late Executive proceedings in relation to the public revenue, has assumed upon himself authority and power not conferred by the constitution and laws, but in derogation of both."

Having had the honor, through the voluntary suffrages of the American people, to fill the office of President of the United States during the period which may be presumed to have been referred to in this resolution, it is sufficiently evident that the censure it inflicts was intended for myself. Without notice, unheard and untried, I thus find myself charged on the records of the Senate, and in a form hitherto unknown in our history, with the crime of violating the laws and constitution of my country.

It can seldom be necessary for any department of the Government, when assailed in conversation, or debate, or by the strictures of the press or of popular assemblies, to step out of its ordinary path for the purpose of vindicating its conduct, or of pointing out any irregularity or injustice in the manner of the attack. But when the chief Executive Magistrate is, by one of the most important branches of the Government, in its official capacity, in a public manner, and by its recorded sentence, but without precedent, competent authority, or just cause, declared guilty of a breach of the laws and constitution, it is due to his station, to public opinion, and to a proper self-respect, that the officer thus denounced should promptly expose the wrong which has been done.

In the present case, moreover, there is even a stronger necessity for such a vindication. By an express provision of the constitution, before the President of the United States can enter on the execution of his office, he is required to take an oath or affirmation in the following words:

"I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will faithfully execute the office of President of the United States; and will, to the best of my ability, preserve, protect, and defend the constitution of the United States."

The duty of defending, so far as in him lies, the integrity of the constitution, would indeed have resulted from the very nature of his office; but by thus expressing it in the official oath or affirmation, which, in this respect, differs from that of every other functionary, the founders of our republic have attested their sense of its importance, and have given to it a peculiar solemnity and force. Bound to the performance of this duty by the oath I have taken, by the strongest obligations of gratitude to the American people, and by the ties which unite my every earthly interest with the welfare and glory of my country, and perfectly convinced that the discussion and passage of the above-mentioned resolution were not only unauthorized by the constitution, but in many respects repugnant to its provisions; and subversive of the rights secured by it to other co-ordinate departments, I deem it an imperative duty to maintain the supremacy of that sacred instrument, and the immunities of the department intrusted to my care, by all means consistent with my own lawful powers, with the rights of others, and with the genius of our civil institutions. To this end, I have caused this, my solemn protest against the aforesaid proceedings, to be placed on the files of the Executive department, and to be transmitted to the Senate.

It is alike due to the subject, the Senate, and the people, that the views which I have taken of the proceedings referred to, and which compel me to regard them in the light that has been mentioned, should be exhibited at length, and with the freedom and firmness which are required by an occasion so unprecedented and peculiar.

Under the constitution of the United States, the powers and functions of the various departments of the Federal Government, and their responsibilities for violation or neglect of duty, are clearly defined, or result by necessary inference. The legislative power, subject to the qualified negative of the President, is vested in the Congress of the United States, composed of the Senate and House of Representatives. The executive power is vested exclusively in the President, except that in the conclusion of treaties and in certain appointments to office, he is to act with the advice and consent of the Senate. The judicial power is vested exclusively in the Supreme and other courts of the United States, except in cases of impeachment, for which purpose the accusatory power is vested in the House of Representatives, and that of hearing and determining, in the Senate. But although for the special purposes which have been mentioned, there is an occasional intermixture of the powers of the different departments, yet with these exceptions, each of the three great departments is independent of the others in its sphere of action; and when it deviates from that sphere, is not responsible to the others, further than it is expressly made so in the constitution. In every other respect, each of them is the co-equal of the other two, and all are the servants of the American people, without power or right to control or censure each other in the service of their common superior, save only in the manner and to the degree which that superior has prescribed.

The responsibilities of the President are numerous and weighty. He is liable to impeachment for high crimes and misdemeanors, and, on due conviction, to removal from office, and perpetual disqualification; and notwithstanding such conviction, he may also be indicted and punished according to law. He is also liable to the private action of any party who may have been injured by his illegal mandates or instructions, in the same manner and to the same extent as the humblest functionary. In addition to the responsibilities which may thus be enforced by impeachment, criminal prosecution, or suit at law, he is also accountable at the bar of public opinion, for every act of his administration. Subject only to the restraints of truth and justice, the free people of the United States have the undoubted right, as individuals or collectively, orally or in writing, at such times, and in such language and form as they may think proper, to discuss his official conduct, and to express and promulgate their opinions concerning it. Indirectly, also, his conduct may come under review in either branch of the legislature, or in the Senate when acting in its executive capacity; and so far as the executive or legislative proceedings of these bodies may require it, it may be examined by them. These are believed to be the proper and only modes in which the President of the United States is to be held accountable for his official conduct.

Tested by these principles, the resolution of the Senate is wholly unauthorized by the constitution, and in derogation of its entire spirit. It assumes that a single branch of the legislative department may, for the purposes of a public censure, and without any view to legislation or impeachment, take up, consider, and decide upon, the official acts of the Executive. But in no part of the constitution is the President subjected to any such responsibility; and in no part of that instrument is any such power conferred on either branch of the legislature.

The justice of these conclusions will be illustrated and confirmed by a brief analysis of the powers of the Senate, and a comparison of their recent proceedings with those powers.

The high functions assigned by the constitution to the Senate, are in their nature either legislative, executive, or judicial. It is only in the exercise of its judicial powers, when sitting as a court for the trial of impeachments, that the Senate is expressly authorized and necessarily required to consider and decide upon the conduct of the President, or any other public officer. Indirectly, however, as has already been suggested, it may frequently be called on to perform that office. Cases may occur in the course of its legislative or executive proceedings, in which it may be indispensable to the proper exercise of its powers, that it should inquire into, and decide upon, the conduct of the President or other public officers; and in every such case, its constitutional right to do so is cheerfully conceded. But to authorize the Senate to enter on such a task in its legislative or executive capacity, the inquiry must actually grow out of and tend to some legislative or executive action; and the decision, when expressed, must take the form of some appropriate legislative or executive act.

The resolution in question was introduced, discussed, and passed, not as a joint, but as a separate resolution. It asserts no legislative power; proposes no legislative action; and neither possesses the form nor any of the attributes of a legislative measure. It does not appear to have been entertained or passed with any view or expectation of its issuing in a law or joint resolution, or in the repeal of any law or joint resolution, or in any other legislative action.

Whilst wanting both the form and substance of a legislative measure, it is equally manifest that the resolution was not justified by any of the executive powers conferred on the Senate. These powers relate exclusively to the consideration of treaties and nominations to office; and they are exercised in secret session, and with closed doors. This resolution does not apply to any treaty or nomination, and was passed in a public session.

Nor does this proceeding in any way belong to that class of incidental resolutions which relate to the officers of the Senate, to their chamber, and other appertinances, or to subjects of order, and other matters of the like nature—in all which either House may lawfully proceed, without any co-operation with the other, or with the President.

On the contrary, the whole phraseology and sense of the resolution seem to be judicial. Its essence, true character, and only practical effect, are to be found in the conduct which it charges upon the President, and in the judgment which it pronounces on that conduct. The resolution, therefore, though discussed and adopted by the Senate in its legislative capacity, is, in its office, and in all its characteristics, essentially judicial.

That the Senate possesses a high judicial power, and that instances may occur in which the President of the United States will be amenable to it, is undeniable. But under the provisions of the constitution, it would seem to be equally plain that neither the President nor any other officer can be rightfully subjected to the operation of the judicial power of the Senate, except in the cases and under the forms prescribed by the constitution.

The constitution declares that "the President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors"—that the House of Representatives "shall have the sole power of impeachment"—that the Senate

"shall have the sole power to try all impeachments"—that "when sitting for that purpose, they shall be on oath or affirmation"—that "when the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside"—that "no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present"—and that "judgment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit, under the United States."

The resolution above quoted charges in substance, that in certain proceedings relating to the public revenue, the President has usurped authority and power not conferred upon him by the constitution and laws, and that in doing so he violated both. Any such act constitutes a high crime—one of the highest, indeed, which the President can commit—a crime which justly exposes him to impeachment by the House of Representatives, and upon due conviction, to removal from office, and to the complete and immutable disfranchisement prescribed by the constitution.

The resolution, then, was in substance an impeachment of the President; and in its passage, amounts to a declaration, by a majority of the Senate, that he is guilty of an impeachable offence. As such, it is spread upon the Journals of the Senate—published to the nation and to the world—made part of our enduring archives—and incorporated in the history of the age. The punishment of removal from office and future disqualification, does not, it is true, follow this decision; nor would it have followed the like decision, if the regular forms of proceeding had been pursued, because the requisite number did not concur in the result. But the moral influence of a solemn declaration, by a majority of the Senate, that the accused is guilty of the offence charged upon him, has been as effectually secured, as if the like declaration had been made upon an impeachment expressed in the same terms. Indeed, a greater practical effect has been gained, because the votes given for the resolution, though not sufficient to authorize a judgment of guilty on an impeachment, were numerous enough to carry that resolution.

That the resolution does not expressly allege that the assumption of power and authority which it condemns, was intentional and corrupt, is no answer to the preceding view of its character and effect. The act thus condemned, necessarily implies volition and design in the individual to whom it is imputed; and being unlawful in its character, the legal conclusion is, that it was prompted by improper motives, and committed with an unlawful intent. The charge is not of a mistake in the exercise of supposed powers, but of the assumption of powers not conferred by the constitution and laws, but in derogation of both; and nothing is suggested to excuse or palliate the turpitude of the act. In the absence of any such excuse or palliation, there is only room for one inference, and that is, that the intent was unlawful and corrupt. Besides, the resolution not only contains no mitigating suggestion, but on the contrary, it holds up the act complained of, as justly obnoxious to censure and reprobation; and thus as distinctly stamps it with impurity of motive, as if the strongest epithets had been used.

The President of the United States, therefore, has been, by a majority of his constitutional triers, accused and found guilty of an impeachable offence: but in no part of this proceeding have the directions of the constitution been observed.

The impeachment, instead of being preferred and prosecuted by the House of Representatives, originated in the Senate, and was prosecuted without the aid or concurrence of the other House. The oath or affirmation prescribed by the constitution, was not taken by the Senators—the Chief Justice did not preside—no notice of the charge was given to the accused—and no opportunity afforded him to respond to the accusation—to meet his accusers.

face to face—to cross-examine the witnesses—to procure counteracting testimony—or to be heard in his defence. The safeguards and formalities which the constitution has connected with the power of impeachment, were doubtless supposed by the framers of that instrument, to be essential to the protection of the public servant, to the attainment of justice, and to the order, impartiality, and dignity of the procedure. These safeguards and formalities were not only practically disregarded, in the commencement and conduct of these proceedings, but in their result, I find myself convicted, by less than two-thirds of the members present, of an impeachable offence.

In vain may it be alleged in defence of this proceeding, that the form of the resolution is not that of an impeachment, or of a judgment thereupon; that the punishment prescribed in the constitution does not follow its adoption; or that in this case, no impeachment is to be expected from the House of Representatives. It is because it did not assume the form of an impeachment, that it is the more palpably repugnant to the constitution; for it is through that form only that the President is judicially responsible to the Senate; and though neither removal from office nor future disqualification ensues, yet it is not to be presumed that the framers of the constitution considered either or both of those results, as constituting the whole of the punishment they prescribed. The judgment of guilty by the highest tribunal in the Union; the stigma it would inflict on the offender, his family and fame; and the perpetual record on the Journal, handing down to future generations the story of his disgrace, were doubtless regarded by them as the bitterest portions, if not the very essence of that punishment. So far, therefore, as some of its most material parts are concerned, the passage, recording, and promulgation of the resolution, are an attempt to bring them on the President, in a manner unauthorized by the constitution. To shield him and other officers who are liable to impeachment, from consequences so momentous, except when really merited by official delinquencies, the constitution has most carefully guarded the whole process of impeachment. A majority of the House of Representatives must think the officer guilty, before he can be charged. Two-thirds of the Senate must pronounce him guilty, or he is deemed to be innocent. Forty-six Senators appear by the Journal to have been present when the vote on the resolution was taken. If, after all the solemnities of an impeachment, thirty of those Senators had voted that the President was guilty, yet would he have been acquitted; but by the mode of proceeding adopted in the present case, a lasting record of conviction has been entered up by the votes of twenty-six Senators, without an impeachment of trial; whilst the constitution expressly declares that to the entry of such a judgment, an accusation by the House of Representatives, a trial by the Senate, and a concurrence of two-thirds in the vote of guilty, shall be indispensable prerequisites.

Whether or not an impeachment was to be expected from the House of Representatives, was a point on which the Senate had no constitutional right to speculate, and in respect to which, even had it possessed the spirit of prophecy, its anticipations would have furnished no just grounds for this procedure. Admitting that there was reason to believe that a violation of the constitution and laws had been actually committed by the President, still it was the duty of the Senate, as his sole constitutional judges, to wait for an impeachment until the other House should think proper to prefer it. The members of the Senate could have no right to infer that no impeachment was intended. On the contrary, every legal and rational presumption on their part ought to have been, that if there was good reason to believe him guilty of an impeachable offence, the House of Representatives would perform its constitutional duty, by arraigning the offender before the justice of his country. The contrary presumption would involve an application derogatory to the integrity and honor of the representatives of the people. But suppose the suspicion thus implied were actually entertained, and for good cause, how can it justify the assumption by the Senate of powers not conferred by the constitution?

It is only necessary to look at the condition in which the Senate and the President have been placed by this proceeding, to perceive its utter incompatibility with the provisions and the spirit of the constitution, and with the plainest dictates of humanity and justice.

If the House of Representatives shall be of opinion that there is just ground for the censure pronounced upon the President, then will it be the solemn duty of that House to prefer the proper accusation, and to cause him to be brought to trial by the constitutional tribunal. But in what condition would he find that tribunal? A majority of its members have already considered the case, and have not only formed, but expressed a deliberate judgment upon its merits. It is the policy of our benign systems of jurisprudence, to secure, in all criminal proceedings, and even in the most trivial litigations, a fair, unprejudiced, and impartial trial. And surely it cannot be less important that such a trial should be secured to the highest officer of the Government.

The constitution makes the House of Representatives the exclusive judges, in the first instance, of the question, whether the President has committed an impeachable offence. A majority of the Senate, whose interference with this preliminary question has, for the best of all reasons, been studiously excluded, anticipate the action of the House of Representatives, assume not only the function which belongs exclusively to that body, but convert themselves into accusers, witnesses, counsel, and judges, and prejudge the whole case—thus presenting the appalling spectacle, in a free state, of judges going through a labored preparation for an impartial hearing and decision, by a previous ex parte investigation and sentence against the supposed offender.

There is no more settled axiom in that government whence we derived the model of this part of our constitution, than that "the Lords cannot impeach any to themselves, nor join in the accusation, because they are judges." Independently of the general reasons on which this rule is founded, its propriety and importance are greatly increased by the nature of the impeaching power. The power of arraigning the high officers of government before a tribunal whose sentence may expel them from their seats and brand them as infamous, is eminently a popular remedy—a remedy designed to be employed for the protection of private right and public liberty, against the abuses of injustice and the encroachments of arbitrary power. But the framers of the constitution were also undoubtedly aware, that this formidable instrument had been, and might be abused; and that from its very nature, an impeachment for high crimes and misdemeanors, whatever might be its result, would in most cases be accompanied by so much of dishonor and reproach, solicitude and suffering, as to make the power of preferring it, one of the highest solemnity and importance. It was due to both these considerations, that the impeaching power should be lodged in the hands of those who, from the mode of their election and the tenure of their offices, would most accurately express the popular will, and at the same time be most directly and speedily amenable to the people. The theory of these wise and benignant intentions is, in the present case, effectually defeated by the proceedings of the Senate. The members of that body represent, not the people, but the States, and though they are undoubtedly responsible to the States, yet, from their extended term of service, the effect of that responsibility, during the whole period of that term, must very much depend upon their own impressions of its obligatory force. When a body, thus constituted, expresses, beforehand, its opinion in a particular case, and thus indirectly invites a prosecution, it not only assumes a power intended for wise reasons to be confined to others, but it shields the latter from that exclusive and personal responsibility under which it was intended to be exercised, and reverses the whole scheme of this part of the constitution.

Such would be some of the objections to this procedure, even if it were admitted that there is just ground for imputing to the President the offences charged in the resolution. But if, on the other hand, the House of Representatives shall be of opinion that there is no reason for charging them upon him, and shall therefore deem it improper to prefer an impeachment, then will the violation of privilege as it respects that House, of justice as it regards the President, and of the constitution as it relates to both, be only the more conspicuous and impressive.

The constitutional mode of procedure on an impeachment has not only been wholly disregarded, but some of the first principles of natural right and enlightened jurisprudence, have been violated in the very form of the resolution. It carefully abstains from averring in which of "the late proceedings in relation to the public revenue, the President has assumed upon himself authority and power not conferred by the constitution and laws." It carefully abstains from specifying what laws or what parts of the constitution have been violated. Why was not the certainty of the offence—"the nature and cause of the accusation"—set out in the manner required in the constitution, before even the humblest individual, for the smallest crime, can be exposed to condemnation? Such a specification was due to the accused, that he might direct his defence to the real points of attack; to the people, that they might clearly understand in what particulars their institutions had been violated; and to the truth and certainty of our public annals. As the record now stands, whilst the resolution plainly charges upon the President at least one act of usurpation in "the late Executive proceedings in relation to the public revenue," and is so framed that those Senators who believed that one such act, and only one, had been committed, could assent to it, its language is yet broad enough to include several such acts; and so it may have been regarded by some of those who voted for it. But though the accusation is thus comprehensive in the censures it implies, there is no such certainty of time, place, or circumstance, as to exhibit the particular conclusion of fact or law which induced any one Senator to vote for it. And it may well have happened, that whilst one Senator believed that some particular act embraced in the resolution, was an arbitrary and unconstitutional assumption of power, others of the majority may have deemed that very act both constitutional and expedient, or if not expedient, yet still within the pale of the constitution. And thus a majority of the Senators may have been enabled to concur, in a vague and undefined accusation, that the President, in the course of "the late Executive proceedings in relation to the public revenue," had violated the constitution and laws; whilst, if a separate vote had been taken in respect to each particular act included within the general terms, the accusers of the President might, on any such vote, have been found in the minority.

Still further to exemplify this feature of the proceeding, it is important to be remarked, that the resolution, as originally offered to the Senate, specified, with adequate precision, certain acts of the President, which it denounced as a violation of the constitution and laws, and that it was not until the very close of the debate, and when, perhaps, it was apprehended that a majority might not sustain the specific accusation contained in it, that the resolution was so modified as to assume its present form. A more striking illustration of the soundness and necessity of the rules which forbid vague and indefinite generalities, and require a reasonable certainty in all judicial allegations, and a more glaring instance of the violation of those rules, has seldom been exhibited.

In this view of the resolution, it must certainly be regarded, not as a vindication of any particular provision of the law or the constitution, but simply as an official rebuke or condemnatory sentence, too general and indefinite to be easily repelled, but yet sufficiently precise to bring into discredit the conduct and motives of the Executive. But whatever it may have been intended to accomplish, it is obvious that the vague, general, and abstract form of the resolution, is in perfect keeping with those other departures from first principles and settled improvements in jurisprudence, so properly the boast of free countries in modern times. And it is not too much to say of the whole of these proceedings, that they shall be approved and sustained by an intelligent people, then will that great contest with arbitrary power, which had established in statutes, in bills of rights, in sacred charters, and in constitutions of government, the right of every citizen to a notice before trial, to a hearing before conviction, and to an impartial tribunal for deciding on the charge, have been waged in vain.

If the resolution had been left in its original form, it is not to be presumed that it could ever have received the assent of a majority of the Senate, for the acts therein specified as violations of the constitution and laws were clearly within the limits of the Executive authority. They are, the "dismissing the late Secretary of the Treasury because he would not, contrary to his sense of his duty, remove the money of the United States in deposit with the Bank of the United States and its branches, in conformity with the President's opinion, and appointing his successor to effect such removal, which has been done." But as no other specification has been substituted, and as these were the "Executive proceedings in relation to the public revenue," principally referred to in the course of the discussion, they will doubtless be generally regarded as the acts intended to be denounced as "an assumption of authority and power not conferred by the constitution or laws, but in derogation of both." It is, therefore, due to the occasion that a condensed summary of the views of the Executive in respect to them, should be here exhibited.

By the constitution, "the executive power is vested in the President of the United States." Among the duties imposed upon him, and which he is sworn to perform, is that of "taking care that the laws be faithfully executed." Being thus made responsible for the entire action of the executive department, it was but reasonable that the power of appointing, overseeing, and controlling those who execute the laws—a power in its nature executive—should remain in his hands. It is, therefore, not only his right, but the constitution makes it his duty, to "nominate and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate appoint," all "officers of the United States whose appointments are not in the constitution otherwise provided for," with a proviso that the appointment of inferior officers may be vested in the President alone, in the courts of justice, or in the heads of departments.

The executive power vested in the Senate, is neither that of "nominating" nor "appointing." It is merely a check upon the Executive power of appointment. If individuals proposed for appointment by the President are by them deemed incompetent or unworthy, they may withhold their consent, and the appointment cannot be made. They check the action of the Executive, but cannot, in relation to those very subjects, act themselves nor direct him. Selections are still made by the President, and the negative given to the Senate, without diminishing his responsibility, furnishes an additional guarantee to the country that the subordinate executive, as well as the judicial offices, shall be filled with worthy and competent men.

The whole executive power being vested in the President, who is responsible for its exercise, it is a necessary consequence, that he should have a right to employ agents of his own choice to aid him in the performance of his duties, and to discharge them when he is no longer willing to be responsible for their acts. In strict accordance with this principle, the power of removal, which, like that of appointment, is an original executive power, is left unchecked by the constitution in relation to all executive officers, for whose conduct the President is responsible, while it is taken from him in relation to judicial officers, for whose acts he is not responsible. In the government from which many of the fundamental principles of our system are derived, the head of the executive department originally had power to appoint and remove it will all officers, executive and judicial. It was to take the judges out of this general power of removal, and thus make them independent of the Executive, that the tenure of their offices was changed to good behaviour. Nor is it conceivable, why they are placed, in our constitution, upon a tenure different from that of all other officers appointed by the Executive, unless it be for the same purpose.

But if there were any just ground for doubt on the face of the constitution, whether all executive officers are removable at the will of the President, it is obviated by the contemporaneous construction of the instrument, and the uniform practice under it.

The power of removal was a topic of solemn debate in the Congress of 1789, while organizing the administrative departments of the Government, and it was finally decided, that the President derived from the constitution the power of removal, so far as it regards that department or whose acts he is responsible. Although the debate covered the whole ground, embracing the Treasury as well as all the other executive departments, it arose on a motion to strike out of the bill to establish a Department of Foreign Affairs, since called the Department of State, a clause declaring the Secretary "to be removable from office by the President of the United States." After that motion had been decided in the negative, it was perceived that these words did not convey the sense of the House of Representatives, in relation to the true source of the power of removal. With the avowed object of preventing any future inference, that this power was exercised by the President in virtue of a grant from Congress, when in fact that body considered it as derived from the constitution, the words which had been the subject of debate were struck out, and in lieu thereof a clause was inserted in a provision concerning the chief clerk of the department, which declared that "whenever the said principal officer shall be removed from office by the President of the United States, or in any other case of vacancy," the chief clerk should, during such vacancy, have charge of the papers of the office. This change having been made for the express purpose of declaring the sense of Congress, that the President derived the power of removal from the constitution, the act as it passed has always been considered as a full expression of the sense of the legislature on this important part of the American constitution.

Here then we have the concurrent authority of President Washington, of the Senate, and the House of Representatives, numbers of whom had taken an active part in the convention which framed the constitution and in the State conventions which adopted it, that the President derived an unqualified power of removal from that instrument itself, which is "beyond the reach of legislative authority." Upon this principle the Government has now been steadily administered for about forty-five years, during which there have been numerous removals made by the President or by his direction, embracing every grade of executive officers, from the heads of departments to the messengers of bureaus.

The Treasury Department, in the discussions of 1789, was considered on the same footing as the other executive departments, and in the act establishing it, the precise words were incorporated, indicative of the sense of Congress that the President derives his power to remove the Secretary, from the constitution, which appear in the act establishing the Department of Foreign Affairs. An assistant Secretary of the Treasury was created, and it was provided that he should take charge of the books and papers of the department, "whenever the Secretary shall be removed from office by the President of the United States." The Secretary of the Treasury being appointed by the President, and being considered as constitutionally removable by him, it appears never to have occurred to any one in the Congress of 1789, or since, until very recently, that he was other than an executive officer, the mere instrument of the Chief Magistrate in the execution of the laws, subject, like all other heads of departments, to his supervision and control. No such idea as an officer of the Congress can be found in the constitution, or appears to have suggested itself to those who organized the Government. There are officers of each House, the appointment of which is authorized by the constitution, but all officers referred to in that instrument as coming within the appointing power of the President, whether established thereby or created by law, are "officers of the United States." No joint power of appointment is given to the two Houses of Congress, nor is there any accountability to them as one body; but as soon as any office is created by law, of whatever name or character, the appointment of the person or persons to fill it, devolves by the constitution upon the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, unless it be an inferior office, and the appointment be vested by the law itself "in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments."

But at the time of the organization of the Treasury Department, an incident occurred which distinctly evinces the unanimous concurrence of the first Congress in the principle that the Treasury Department is wholly executive in its character and responsibilities. A motion was made to strike out the provision of the bill making it the duty of the Secretary "to digest and report plans for the improvement and management of the revenue, and for the support of public credit," on the ground that it would give the executive department of the Government too much influence and power in Congress. The motion was not opposed on the ground, that the Secretary was the officer of Congress and responsible to that body, which would have been conclusive, if admitted, but on other grounds, which conceded his executive character throughout. The whole discussion evinces a unanimous concurrence in the principle, that the Secretary of the Treasury is wholly an executive officer, and the struggle of the minority was to restrict his power as such. From that time down to the present, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Treasurer, Register, Comptrollers, Auditors, and Clerks, who fill the offices of that department, have, in the practice of the Government, been considered and treated as on the same footing with corresponding grades of officers in all the other executive departments.

The custody of the public property, under such regulations as may be prescribed by legislative authority, has always been considered an appropriate function of the executive department, in this and all other Governments. In accordance with this principle, every species of property belonging to the United States, (excepting that which is in the use of the several co-ordinate departments of the Government, as means to aid them in performing their appropriate functions,) is in charge of officers appointed by the President, whether it be lands, or buildings, or merchandise, or provisions, or clothing, or arms and munitions of war. The superintendents and keepers of the whole are appointed by the President, responsible to him, and removable at his will.

Public money is but a species of public property. It cannot be raised by taxation or custom, nor brought into the Treasury in any other way, except by law; but whenever or howsoever obtained, its custody always has been, and always must be, unless the constitution be changed, intrusted to the executive department. No officer can be created by Congress for the purpose of taking charge of it, whose appointment would not, by the constitution, at once devolve on the President, and who would not be responsible to him for the faithful performance of his duties. The legislative power may undoubtedly bind him and the President, by any laws they may think proper to enact; they may prescribe in what place particular portions of the public money shall be kept, and for what reason it shall be removed; as they may direct that supplies for the army or navy shall be kept in particular stores; and it will be the duty of the President to see that the law is faithfully executed—yet will the custody remain in the executive department of the Government. Were the Congress to assume, with or without a legislative act, the power of appointing officers independently of the President, to take the charge and custody of the public property contained in the military and naval arsenals, magazines, and storehouses, it is believed that such an act would be regarded by all as a palpable usurpation of executive power, subversive of the forms as well as the fundamental principles of our Government. But where is the difference in principle, whether the public property be in the form of arms, munitions of war and supplies, or in gold and silver or bank notes? None can be perceived—none is believed to exist. Congress cannot, therefore, take out of the hands of the executive department the custody of the public property or money, without an assumption of executive power, and a subversion of the first principles of the constitution.

The Congress of the United States have never passed an act imperatively directing that the public moneys shall be kept in any particular place or places. From the origin of the Government to the year 1816, the statute-book was wholly silent on the subject. In 1789 a Treasurer was created, subordinate to the Secretary of the Treasury, and through him to the President. He was required to give bond safely to keep and faithfully to disburse the public moneys, without any direction as to the manner or places in which they should be kept. By reference to the practice of the Government, it is found, that from its first organization, the Secretary of the Treasury, acting under the supervision of the President, designated the places in which the public moneys should be kept, and specially directed all transfers from place to place. This practice was continued, with the silent acquiescence of Congress, from 1789 down to 1816; and although many banks were selected and discharged, and although a portion of the moneys was first placed in the State banks, and then in the former Bank of the United States, and upon the dissolution of that, was again transferred to the State banks, no legislation was thought necessary by Congress, and all the operations were originated and perfected by executive authority. The Secretary of the Treasury, responsible to the President, and with his approbation, made contracts and arrangements in relation to the whole subject-matter, which was thus entirely committed to the direction of the President, under his responsibilities to the American people, and to those who were authorized to impeach and punish him for any breach of this important trust.

The act of 1816, establishing the Bank of the United States, directed the deposits of public money to be made in that bank and its branches, in places in which the said bank and branches thereof may be established, "unless the Secretary of the Treasury should otherwise order and direct," in which event, he was required to give his reasons to Congress. This was but a continuation of his pre-existing powers as the head of an executive department, to direct where the deposits should be made, with the superadded obligation of giving his reasons to Congress for making them elsewhere than in the Bank of the United States and its branches. It is not to be considered that this provision in any degree altered the relation between the Secretary of the Treasury and the President, as the responsible head of the executive department, or released the latter from his constitutional obligation to "take care that the laws be faithfully executed." On the contrary, it increased his responsibilities, by adding another to the long list of laws which it was his duty to carry into effect.

It would be an extraordinary result, if, because a person charged by law with a public duty is one of the Secretaries, it were less the duty of the President to see that law faithfully executed than other laws enjoining duties upon subordinate officers or private citizens. If there be any difference, it would seem that the obligation is the stronger in relation to the former, because the neglect is in his presence and the remedy at hand.

It cannot be doubted that it was the legal duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to order and direct the deposits of the public money to be made elsewhere than in the Bank of the United States, whenever sufficient reasons existed for making the change. If, in such a case, he neglected or refused to act, he would neglect or refuse to execute the law. What would then be the duty of the President? Could he say that the constitution did not bind him to see the law faithfully executed, because it was one of his Secretaries, and not himself, to whom the service was specially imposed? Might he be asked whether there was any such limitation to the obligations prescribed in the constitution?—whether it is not equally bound to take care that the laws be faithfully executed, whether they impose duties on the highest officer of state, or the lowest subordinate in any of the departments? Might he not be told, that it was the sole purpose of causing all executive officers, from the highest to the lowest, faithfully to perform the services required of them by law—that the people of the United States have made him their Chief Magistrate, and the constitution has clothed him with the entire executive power of this Government? The principles implicated in these questions appear too plain to need elucidation.

But here, also, we have a contemporaneous construction of the act, which shows that it was not understood as in any way changing the relations between the President and Secretary of the Treasury, or as placing the latter out of Executive control, even in relation to the deposits of the public money. Nor on this point are we left to any equivocal testimony. The documents of the Treasury Department show that the Secretary of the Treasury did apply to the President, and obtained his approbation and sanction to the original transfer of the public deposits to the present Bank of the United States, and did carry the measure into effect in obedience to his decision. They also show that transfers of the public deposits from the branches of the Bank of the United States to State banks, at Chillicothe, Cincinnati, and Louisville, in 1823, were made with the approbation of the President, and by his authority. They show, that upon all important questions appertaining to his department, whether they related to the public deposits or other matters, it was the constant practice of the Secretary of the Treasury to obtain for his acts the approval and sanction of the Presdent. These acts, and the principles on which they were founded, were known to all the departments of the Government, to Congress, and the country; and, until very recently, appear never to have been called in question.

Thus was it settled by the constitution, the laws, and the whole practice of the Government, that the entire executive power is vested in the President of the United States; that, as incident to that power, the right of appointing and removing those officers who are to aid him in the execution of the laws, with such restrictions only as the constitution prescribes, is vested in the President; that the Secretary of the Treasury is one of those officers; that the custody of the public property and money is an executive function, which, in relation to the money, has always been exercised through the Secretary of the Treasury and his subordinates; that in the performance of these duties, he is subject to the supervision and control of the President, and in all important measures having relation to them, consults the Chief Magistrate, and obtains his approval and sanction; that the law establishing the bank did not, as it could not, change the relation between the President and the Secretary—did not release the former from his obligation to see the law faithfully executed, nor the latter from the President's supervision and control; that afterwards, and before, the Secretary did in fact consult and obtain the sanction of the President, to transfers and removals of the public deposits; and that all departments of the Government, and the nation itself, approved or acquiesced in these acts and principles, as in strict conformity with our constitution and laws.

During the last year, the approaching termination, according to the provisions of its charter, and the solemn decision of the American people, of the Bank of the United States, made it expedient, and its exposed abuses and corruptions made it, in my opinion, the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, to place the moneys of the United States in other depositories. The Secretary did not concur in that opinion, and declined giving the necessary order and direction. So glaring were the abuses and corruptions of the bank, so evident its fixed purpose to persevere in them, and so palpable its design, by its money and power to control the Government, and change its character, that I deemed it the imperative duty of the executive authority, by the exertion of every power confided to it by the constitution and laws, to check its career, and lessen its ability to do mischief, even in the painful alternative of dismissing the head of one of the departments. At the time the removal was made, other causes sufficient to justify it existed; but, if they had not, the Secretary would have been dismissed for this cause only.

His place I supplied by one whose opinions were well known to me, and whose frank expressions of them, in another situation, and whose generous sacrifices of interest and feeling, when unexpectedly called to the station he now occupies, ought forever to have shielded his motives from suspicion, and his character from reproach. In accordance with the opinions long before expressed by him, he proceeded, with my sanction, to make arrangements for depositing the moneys of the United States in other safe institutions.

The resolution of the Senate, as originally framed, and as passed, if it refers to these acts, pre-supposes a right in that body to interfere with this exercise of executive power. If the principle be once admitted, it is not difficult to perceive where it may end. If, by a mere denunciation like this resolution, the President should ever be induced to act, in a matter of official duty, contrary to the honest convictions of his own mind, in compliance with the wishes of the Senate, the constitutional independence of the executive department would be as effectually destroyed, and its power as effectually transferred to the Senate, as if that end had been accomplished by an amendment of the constitution. But, if the Senate have a right to interfere with the executive powers, they have also the right to make that interference effective; and if the assertion of the power implied in the resolution be silently acquiesced in, we may reasonably apprehend that it will be followed, at some future day, by an attempt at actual enforcement. The Senate may refuse, except on the condition that he will surrender his opinions to theirs and obey their will, to perform their own constitutional functions; to pass the necessary laws; to sanction appropriations proposed by the House of Representatives; and to confirm proper nominations made by the President. It has already been maintained (and it is not conceivable that the resolution of the Senate can be based on any other principle) that the Secretary of the Treasury is the officer of Congress, and independent of the President; that the President has no right to control him, and consequently none to remove him. With the same propriety, and on similar grounds, may the Secretary of State, the Secretaries of War and the Navy, and the Postmaster General, each in succession, be declared independent of the President, the subordinates of Congress, and removable only with the concurrence of the Senate. Followed to its consequences this principle will be found effectually to destroy one co-ordinate department of the Government, to concentrate in the hands of the Senate the whole executive power, and to leave the President as powerless as he would be useless—the shadow of authority, after the substance had departed.

The time and the occasion which have called forth the resolution of the Senate, seem to impose upon me an additional obligation not to pass it over in silence. Nearly forty-five years had the President exercised, without a question as to his rightful authority, those powers for the recent assumption of which he is now denounced. The vicissitudes of peace and war had attended our Government; violent parties, watchful to take advantage of any seeming usurpation on the part of the Executive, had distracted our councils; frequent removals, or forced resignations, in every sense tantamount to removals, had been made of the Secretary and other officers of the Treasury; and yet in no one instance is it known, that any man, whether patriot or partisan, had raised his voice against it as a violation of the constitution. The expediency and justice of such changes, in reference to public officers of all grades, have frequently been the topics of discussion; but the constitutional right of the President to appoint, control, and remove the head of the Treasury, as well as all other departments, seems to have been universally conceded. And what is the occasion upon which other principles have been first officially asserted? The Bank of the United States, a great moneyed monopoly, had attempted to obtain a renewal of its charter, by controlling the elections of the people and the action of the Government. The use of its corporate funds and power in that attempt was fully disclosed; and it made known to the President that the corporation was putting in train the same course of measures, with the view of making another vigorous effort, through an interference in the elections of the people, to control public opinion and force the Government to yield to its demands. This, with its corruption of the press, its violation of its charter, its exclusion of the Government directors from its proceedings, its neglect of duty, and arrogant pretensions, made it, in the opinion of the President, incompatible with the public interest and the safety of our institutions, that it should be longer employed as the fiscal agent of the Treasury. A Secretary of the Treasury, appointed in the recess of the Senate, who had not been confirmed by that body, and whom the President might or might not at his pleasure nominate to them, refused to do what his superior in the executive department considered the most imperative of his duties, and became in fact, however innocent his motives, the protector of the bank. And on this occasion it is discovered for the first time, that those who framed the constitution misunderstood it; that the first Congress and all its successors have been under a delusion; that the practice of near forty-five years is but a continued usurpation; that the Secretary of the Treasury is not responsible to the President; and that to remove him is a violation of the constitution and laws, for which the President deserves to stand forever dishonored on the Journals of the Senate.

There are also some other circumstances connected with the discussion and passage of the resolution, to which I feel it to be, not only my right, but my duty, to refer. It appears by the Journal of the Senate, that among the twenty-six Senators who voted for the resolution on its final passage, and who had supported it in debate, in its original form, were one of the Senators from the State of Maine, the two Senators from New Jersey, and one of the Senators from Ohio. It also appears by the same Journal, and by the files of the Senate, that the legislatures of these States had severally expressed their opinions in respect to the Executive proceedings drawn in question before the Senate.

The two branches of the legislature of the State of Maine, on the 25th of January, 1834, passed a preamble and series of resolutions in the following words:

"Whereas, at an early period after the election of Andrew Jackson to the Presidency, in accordance with the sentiments which he had uniformly expressed, the attention of Congress was called to the constitutionality and expediency of the renewal of the charter of the United States Bank: and whereas, the bank has transcended its chartered limits in the management of its business transactions, and has abandoned the object of its creation, by engaging in political controversies, by wielding its power and influence to embarrass the administration of the General Government, and by bringing insolvency and distress upon the commercial community: and whereas, the public security from such an institution consists less in its present pecuniary capacity to discharge its liabilities than in the fidelity with which the trusts reposed in it have been executed: and whereas, the abuse and misapplication of the powers conferred have destroyed the confidence of the public in the officers of the bank, and demonstrated that such powers endanger the stability of republican institutions: Therefore Resolved, That, in the removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States, as well as in the manner of their removal, we recognise in the administration an adherence to constitutional rights, and the performance of a public duty.

"Resolved, That this legislature entertain the same opinion as heretofore expressed by the preceding legislatures of this State, that the Bank of the United States ought not to be re-chartered.

"Resolved, That the Senators of this State in the Congress of the United States be instructed, and the Representatives be requested, to oppose the restoration of the deposits and the renewal of the charter of the United States Bank."

On the 11th of January, 1834, the House of Assembly and Council, composing the legislature of the State of New Jersey, passed a preamble and series of resolutions, in the following words:

"Whereas, the present crisis in our public affairs calls for a decided expression of the voice of the people of this State: and whereas, we consider it the undoubted right of the legislatures of the several States to instruct those who represent their interests in the councils of the nation, in all matters which intimately concern the public weal, and may affect the happiness or well-being of the people: therefore—

"1. Be it resolved by the Council and General Assembly of this State, That, while we acknowledge, with feelings of devout gratitude, our obligations to the great Ruler of nations, for his mercies to us as a people, that we have been preserved alike from foreign war, from the evils of internal commotions, and the machinations of designing and ambitious men, who would prostrate the fair fabric of our Union, that we ought, nevertheless, to humble ourselves in His presence, and implore His aid for the perpetuation of our republican institutions, and for a continuance of that unexampled prosperity which our country has hitherto enjoyed.

"2. Resolved, That we have undiminished confidence in the integrity and firmness of the venerable patriot who now holds the distinguished post of Chief Magistrate of this nation, and whose purity of purpose and elevated motives have so often received the unqualified approbation of a large majority of his fellow-citizens.

"3. Resolved, That we view with agitation and alarm the existence of a great moneyed incorporation, which threatens to embarrass the operations of the Government, and by means of its unbounded influence upon the currency of the country, to scatter distress and ruin throughout the community; and that we, therefore, solemnly believe the present Bank of the United States ought not to be re-chartered.

"4. Resolved, That our Senators in Congress be instructed, and our members of the House of Representatives be requested to sustain, by their votes and influence, the course adopted by the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Taney, in relation to the Bank of the United States and the deposits of the Government moneys, believing, as we do, the course of the Secretary to have been constitutional, and that the public good required its adoption.

"5. Resolved, That the Governor be requested to forward a copy of the above resolutions to each of our Senators and Representatives from this State in the Congress of the United States."

On the 21st of February last, the legislature of the same State reiterated the opinions and instructions before given, by joint resolutions, in the following words:

"Resolved by the Council and General Assembly of the State of New Jersey, That they do adhere to the resolutions passed by them on the 11th day of January last, relative to the President of the United States, the Bank of the United States, and the course of Mr. Taney, in removing the Government deposits.

Resolved, That the legislature of New Jersey have not seen any reason to depart from such resolutions since the passage thereof; and it is their wish that they should receive from our Senators and Representatives of this State in the Congress of the United States, that attention and obedience which are due to the opinion of a sovereign State, openly expressed in its legislative capacity."

On the 2d of January, 1834, the Senate and House of Representatives, composing the legislature of Ohio, passed a preamble and resolutions in the following words:

"Whereas there is reason to believe that the Bank of the United States will attempt to obtain a renewal of its charter at the present session of Congress: and whereas it is abundantly evident that said bank has exercised powers derogatory to the spirit of our free institutions, and dangerous to the liberties of these United States: and whereas there is just reason to doubt the constitutional power of Congress to grant acts of incorporation for banking purposes out of the District of Columbia: and whereas as we believe the proper disposal of the public lands to be of the utmost importance to the people of these United States, and that honor and good faith require their equitable distribution: therefore—

"Resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, That we consider the removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States as required by the best interests of our country, and that a proper sense of public duty imperiously demanded that that institution should be no longer used as a depository of the public funds.

"Resolved, also, That we view with decided disapprobation, the renewed attempts in Congress to secure the passage of the bill providing for the disposal of the public domain, upon the principles proposed by Mr. Clay, inasmuch as we believe that such a law would be unequal in its operations, and unjust in its results.

"Resolved, also, That we heartily approve of the principles set forth in the late veto message upon that subject; and,

"Resolved, That our Senators in Congress be instructed, and our Representatives requested, to use their influence to prevent the re-chartering of the Bank of the United States; to sustain the administration in its removal of the public deposits; and to oppose the passage of a land bill containing the principles adopted in the act upon that subject, passed at the last session of Congress.

"Resolved, That the Governor be requested to transmit copies of the foregoing preamble and resolutions to each of our Senators and Representatives."

It is thus seen that four Senators have declared, by their votes, that the President, in the late executive proceedings in relation to the revenue, had been guilty of the impeachable offence of "assuming upon himself authority and power not conferred by the constitution and laws, but in derogation of both," whilst the legislatures of their respective States had deliberately approved those very proceedings, as consistent with the constitution, and demanded by the public good. If these four votes had been given in accordance with the sentiments of the legislatures, is above expressed, there would have been but twenty-four votes out of forty-six for censuring the President, and the unprecedented record of his conviction could not have been placed upon the Journals of the Senate.

In thus referring to the resolutions and instructions of the State legislatures, I disclaim and repudiate all authority or design to interfere with the responsibility due from members of the Senate to their own consciences, their constituents, and their country. The facts now stated belong to the history of these proceedings, and are important to the just development of the principles and interests involved in them, as well as to the proper vindication of the executive department; and with that view, and that view only, are they here made the topic of remark.

The dangerous tendency of the doctrine which denies to the President the power of supervising, directing, and removing the Secretary of the Treasury, in like manner with the other executive officers, would soon be manifest in practice, were the doctrine to be established. The President is the direct representative of the American people, but the Secretaries are not. If the Secretary of the Treasury be independent of the President in the execution of the laws, then is there no direct responsibility to the people in that important branch of this Government to which is committed the care of the national finances. And it is in the power of the Bank of the United States, or any other corporation, body of men, or individuals, if a Secretary shall be found to accord with them in opinion, or can be induced in practice to promote their views, to control, through him, the whole action of the Government, (so far as it is exercised by his department,) in defiance of the Chief Magistrate elected by the people and responsible to them.

But the evil tendency of the particular doctrine adverted to, though sufficiently serious, would be as nothing, in comparison with the pernicious consequences which would inevitably flow from the approbation and allowance by the people, and the practice by the Senate, of the unconstitutional power of arraigning and censuring the official conduct of the Executive, in the manner recently pursued. Such proceedings are eminently calculated to unsettle the foundations of the Government, to disturb the harmonious action of its different departments, and to break down the checks and balances by which the wisdom of its framers sought to ensure its stability and usefulness.

The honest differences of opinion which occasionally exist between the Senate and the President, in regard to matters in which both are obliged to participate, are sufficiently embarrassing. But, if the course recently adopted by the Senate shall hereafter be frequently pursued, it is not only obvious that the harmony of the relations between the President and the Senate will be destroyed, but that other and graver effects will ultimately ensue. If the censures of the Senate be submitted to by the President, the confidence of the people in his ability and virtue, and the character and usefulness of his administration will soon be at an end, and the real power of the Government will fall into the hands of a body holding their offices for long terms, not elected by the people, and not to them directly responsible. If, on the other hand, the illegal censures of the Senate should be resisted by the President, collisions and angry controversies might ensue, discreditable in their progress, and, in the end, compelling the people to adopt the conclusion, either that their Chief Magistrate was unworthy of their respect, or that the Senate was chargeable with calumny and injustice. Either of these results would impair public confidence in the perfection of the system, and lead to serious alterations of its frame work, or to the practical abandonment of some of its provisions.

The influence of such proceedings on the other departments of the Government, and more especially on the States, could not fail to be extensively pernicious. When the judges, in the last resort of official misconduct, themselves overleap the bounds of their authority, as prescribed by the constitution, what general disregard of its provisions might not their example be expected to produce? And who does not perceive that such contempt of the Federal constitution, by one of its most important departments, would hold out the strongest temptation to resistance on the part of the State sovereignties, whenever they shall suppose their just rights to have been invaded? Thus, all the independent departments of the Government, and the States which compose our confederated Union, instead of attending to their appropriate duties, and leaving those who may offend to be reclaimed or punished in the manner pointed out in the constitution, would fall to mutual crimination and recrimination, and give to the people confusion and anarchy, instead of order and law, until at length some form of aristocratic power would be established on the ruins of the constitution, or the States be broken into separate communities.

Far be it from me to charge, or to insinuate, that the present Senate of the United States intend, in the most distant way, to encourage such a result. It is not of their motives or designs, but only of the tendency of their acts, that it is my duty to speak. It is, if possible, to make Senators themselves sensible of the danger which lurks under the precedent set in their resolution, and, at any rate, to perform my duty as the responsible head of one of the co-equal departments of the Government, that I have been compelled to point out the consequences to which the discussion and passage of the resolution may lead, if the tendency of the measure be not checked in its inception.

It is due to the high trust with which I have been charged; to those who may be called to succeed me in it; to the representatives of the people, whose constitutional prerogative has been unlawfully assumed; to the people and to the States; and to the constitution they have established, that I should not permit its provisions to be broken down by such an attack on the executive department, without at least some effort "to preserve, protect, and defend" them. With this view, and for the reasons which have been stated, I do hereby solemnly protest against the aforementioned proceedings of the Senate, as unauthorized by the constitution; contrary to its spirit and to several of its express provisions; subversive of that distribution of the powers of Government which it has ordained and established; destructive of the checks and safeguards by which those powers were intended, on the one hand, to be controlled, and, on the other, to be protected; and calculated, by their immediate and collateral effects, by their character and tendency, to concentrate in the hands of a body not directly amenable to the people, a degree of influence and power dangerous to their liberties, and fatal to the constitution of their choice.

The resolution of the Senate contains an imputation upon my private as well as upon my public character; and as it must stand forever on their Journals, I cannot close this substitute for that defence which I have not been allowed to present in the ordinary form, without remarking, that I have lived in vain, if it be necessary to enter into a formal vindication of my character and purposes from such an imputation. In vain do I bear upon my person, enduring memorials of that contest in which American liberty was purchased; in vain have I since perilled property, fame, and life, in defence of the rights and privileges so dearly bought; in vain am I now, without a personal aspiration, or the hope of individual advantage, encountering responsibilities and dangers, from which, by mere inactivity in relation to a single point, I might have been exempt—if any serious doubts can be entertained as to the purity of my purposes and motives. If I had been ambitious, I should have sought an alliance with that powerful institution, which even now aspires to no divided empire. If I had been venal, I should have sold myself to its designs. Had I preferred personal comfort and official ease to the performance of my arduous duty, I should have ceased to molest it. In the history of conquerors and usurpers, never, in the fire of youth, nor in the vigor of manhood, could I find an attraction to lure me from the path of duty; and now, I shall scarcely find an inducement to commence the career of ambition, when gray hairs and a decaying frame, instead of inviting to toil and battle, call me to the contemplation of other worlds, where conquerors cease to be honored, and usurpers expiate their crimes. The only ambition I can feel, is to acquit myself to Him to whom I must soon render an account of my stewardship, to serve my fellow-men, and live respected and honored in the history of my country. No; the ambition which leads me on, is an anxious desire and a fixed determination, to return to the people, unimpaired, the sacred trust they have confided to my charge—to heal the wounds of the constitution and preserve it from further violation; to persuade my countrymen, so far as I may, that it is not in a splendid Government, supported by powerful monopolies and aristocratical establishments, that they will find happiness, or their liberties protection, but in a plain system, void of pomp—protecting all, and granting favors to none—dispensing its blessings like the dews of heaven, unseen and unfelt, save in the freshness and beauty they contribute to produce. It is such a Government that the genius of our people requires—such a one only under which our States may remain for ages to come, united, prosperous, and free. If the Almighty being who has hitherto sustained and protected me, will but vouchsafe to make my feeble powers instrumental to such a result, I shall anticipate with pleasure the place to be assigned me in the history of my country, and die contented with the belief, that I have contributed in some small degree, to increase the value and prolong the duration of American liberty.

To the end that the resolution of the Senate may not be hereafter drawn into precedent, with the authority of silent acquiescence on the part of the executive department; and to the end, also, that my motives and views in the executive proceeding denounced in that resolution may be known to my fellow-citizens, to the world, and to all posterity, I respectfully request that this message and protest may be entered at length on the Journals of the Senate.

ANDREW JACKSON.

April 15th, 1834.

The message having been read—

Mr. POINDEXTER rose and said: I do not rise, Mr. President, to discuss at this time the various topics which are touched in the very extraordinary paper which has been just read to the Senate; nor, indeed, will I give utterance to those feelings of indignation which such a paper, coming from such a source, is so well calculated to excite in the bosom of every honorable member of this body, and of every patriotic citizen in the country. Leaving these matters for future discussion on a more suitable occasion, my purpose is at present to enter my solemn protest against the reception of this paper, and to submit a motion that it be not received. Sir, I should be disposed to go as far as any honorable Senator on this floor in paying due respect to every executive communication to the Senate, coming within the constitutional range of executive power. But when the Chief Magistrate shall think fit to depart from his constitutional sphere, and, under color of his official duties, attempt to make this body the conduit of his popular appeals to the people, fulminating, I will not say calumnies, but the most unfounded charges against the body through which he proposes to promulgate his appeal, I, for one, feel bound to resist him in such a course. Referring to the resolution introduced by the honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] the President says that it is "both novel and unprecedented." If it be so, I should be glad to know what appellation ought to be given to this extraordinary paper? Has it any parallel in the past political history of the country? Sir, I venture the declaration, that there is not on record any act of the predecessors of the present Chief Magistrate bearing the slightest resemblance to this outrage on the dignity of the Senate, and the constitutional functions of the executive department of the Government. It may well be characterized as "both novel and unprecedented." No such paper was ever presented to either House of Congress, none such is to be found on the journals of our proceedings, as the one sent to us this morning, under the guise of official authority, from the foundation of the Government down to the present moment. Sir, I will not dignify this paper by considering it in the light of an executive message; it is no such thing. I regard it simply as a paper with the signature of Andrew Jackson, and, should the Senate refuse to receive it, it will not be the first paper with the same signature which has been refused a hearing in this body, on the ground of the abusive and vituperative language which it contained. It will be recollected that a protest similar in its character, couched in terms grossly disrespectful to the Senate, was presented, somewhere about the year 1819, from the same individual, and such was its exceptionable character, that his own friends became ashamed of it. It was objected to, rejected, and sent back for modification, so as to render it respectful to the body to which it was presented. The offensive passages were stricken out, and, thus modified, it was presented and received at the next session of Congress. This effort to denounce and overawe the deliberations of the Senate may properly be regarded as capping the climax of that systematic plan of operations which for several years past has been in progress, designed to bring this body into disrepute among the people, and thereby remove the only existing barrier to the arbitrary encroachments and usurpations of executive power. Destroy public confidence in the Senate, which now stands, thank

President's Protest.

[SENATE.]

God, unmoved, between the Chief Magistrate and the people, and tyranny, in its worst forms, would very soon overshadow the land, and rule with an iron hand the destinies of the American people. The Senate, by its peculiar organization, is well calculated to preserve and perpetuate the great fundamental principles of public liberty to the latest posterity. Removed from popular impulses, which sometimes arise in the convulsions incident to freedom of opinion, and of discussions of great political questions, it may look with calmness on the misguided multitude, misled by some popular demagogue, and thereby save the state from the deleterious consequences of errors which are the inevitable result of passion or precipitation. It is an integral part of the executive power, and, while it remains firm in its devotion to the constitution and the laws, uncorrupted by the temptations of office and emolument, no Chief Magistrate, whatever may be his reckless ambition, can successfully move beyond the bounds of his legitimate powers, and ride over the liberties of the people. Hence the untiring and anxious solicitude so often manifested to bring this body, thus constituted, into disgrace among the people. If there existed at this moment no such conservative body as the Senate, power would march onward to the climax of despotism. The republic might indeed exist, nominally, but in practice, we should be bound to the car of some imperial dictator.

There does not appear to be a disposition in the House at the other end of this building, to arrest the inroads of arbitrary power; there the edicts of the Executive are registered, and his acts are defended by the force of party discipline, regardless of their injurious effects on the great interests of the country—and I repeat the question, What would be the condition of the country but for the salutary intervention of that Senate which has become the object of Executive vengeance, and which he now seeks to destroy by denunciations and appeals to the sympathies of the people, founded on his past services and personal popularity? Sir, is there a single power granted in the constitution which the President has not assumed and exercised? I know of none, except that he has not, as yet, followed the example of one of the kings of England, and taken his seat among the judges, to control their judicial decisions. This seems to be the only power which the President has not grasped, to complete the overthrow of all the other departments of the Government. By the frequent and unlimited exercise of the veto power, he has concentrated in himself the entire legislative authority of the country. We may, it is true, overrule his veto, by a majority of two-thirds in both Houses of Congress; but who is there among us, with the Blue Book in his hand, exhibiting the immense patronage of the Chief Magistrate, combined with the weight of his personal influence, that does not see and feel the impossibility of obtaining a union of opinion of two-thirds of Congress against any measure which has the sanction of the President? Such a triumph never has and never will occur in the legislative history of the country. He has declared his intention of applying this tremendous veto power to every bill which does not meet his approbation; or, in other words, he will apply it to any bill against which he would record his vote as a member of either House of Congress. What, then, becomes of the legislative power of Congress? We are reduced to the condition of mere drudges, and the only duty which we can perform, is to prepare bills, discuss and amend them, and adapt them, as far as we can, to the public good, and, after passing them, they must be sent to the imperial read, and he will tell us whether they shall be enacted into laws or not. He might as well dispense with the legislature altogether, and call in the aid of the judges of the Supreme Court and the Attorney General to prepare such bills as may suit his views, in technical language, and then issue his proclamation declaring that such and such laws had been incorporated in the statute-book. Under the free use of the veto power, now for the first time introduced into practice by the President, the legislative power of the Union has dwindled into a mere mockery; the power, it is true, is qualified in the constitution, and may be controlled by two-thirds of Congress, but, in practice, it amounts to an absolute veto. He has the power of appointment and removal from office, and thereby becomes the fountain of honor, one of the high attributes of the British monarch, from whose dominion we had rescued ourselves by the war of the Revolution, in asserting and maintaining the liberty and independence of these States; he is commander-in-chief of the army and navy, and, by an assumption of power not delegated in the constitution and the laws, he has effaced the broad line, wisely drawn between the power which wields the physical force of the country and the national Treasury, for the obvious reason that these powers, separated, can never be dangerous to liberty, while a combination of them, in the same hand, is the very definition of military despotism. Thus the Chief Magistrate arrogates to himself, in the last resort, the legislative authority of the nation; he is placed by the constitution at the head of the military forces and the militia of the several States, when called into actual service; he is the fountain of honor, and may distribute offices and rewards at his own good will and pleasure; he has seized the public purse, by indirection, which is placed by the constitution in the hands of the representatives of the people of the States, and, I ask, what power remains unappropriated to the executive will, which is worth speaking of, or worth contending for? Permit me, sir, to inquire by what means the President has obtained possession of the public money? He claims the power of appointment and removal from office, which I, for one, do not deny that he possesses, because it has been exercised by the Executive from the commencement of the Government—but I utterly deny to him constitutional right to use a legitimate power to effect an illegitimate purpose. Sir, said Mr. P., I contend that there is not a delegated power in the constitution which may not be so perverted as to render its exercise unconstitutional. For instance, the power to lay and collect direct taxes is expressly granted in the constitution, but if a law imposing such taxes was passed for the special purpose of paying the clergy of any religious sect or denomination, would it be contended that the act was constitutional? I presume not—and yet the power to levy impost taxes is delegated to Congress without limitation.

“A little leaven leaveneth the whole lump.” Ergo, if the object for which a law is enacted be plainly and palpably unconstitutional, it derives no sanction from the circumstance that the enumerated powers of Congress embrace the subject on which the act is founded. The end intended to be achieved being a violation of the constitution, the measure is thereby rendered void ab initio, and cannot be redeemed by the perversion of a delegated power. These are my opinions, the truth of which is capable of clear demonstration by a variety of illustrations drawn from the constitution, but at present I forbear to enlarge the discussion on this point. In this light I view the construction put by the President on his power of removal from office. He seems to have discovered a new source from which he may derive new executive powers, in contravention of the constitution and laws of the country. He dare not thrust his hand into the public chest by a direct act, but he has effected the object by indirect means. The Secretary of the Treasury, who refused to bend his neck to the yoke of executive power, and to make himself the instrument of violating the solemn obligations of law at the dictation of the Chief Magistrate, was unceremoniously kicked out of office, and another substituted in his place, with a more pliant conscience, who stood ready to do the bidding of the President, to whose will alone he professed to owe obedience, and to whose authority he felt himself responsible. He thus opened an avenue through which he has marched up to the public Treasury, seized on its contents, and distributed the money collected from the people, and placed under the control of their representatives, throughout the country, to be used for the benefit of his favorites and friends, who doubtless stand in need of some assistance in these hard times.* It is thus, by indirection, the President has perverted a granted power to the accomplishment of an end directly opposed to the spirit and letter of the constitution. Concede the power thus assumed, and it is obvious that the President may evade and effectually prostrate the express provisions of the constitution and laws made in pursuance thereof. In support of these views, and to show to what extent the power of appointment and removal from office may be abused, I will state a single case arising under the constitution.

The President is vested with power to nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint the heads of the several departments of the Government, but Congress may by law vest the appointment of inferior officers in the courts of law or the heads of departments. Suppose Congress, under this express grant of power, should vest the Secretary of the Treasury with the power to appoint all the clerks in his department? Well, sir, the Secretary, acting under the authority of the law, makes out a list of his clerks, carefully selected, and is about to install them into office. In the mean time, however, the President receives from his underwriters, who undertake to manage the affairs of state, another list of names more acceptable to them, which they recommend for their fidelity to the Jackson cause—may he not send this new list to the Secretary, with his instruction, "Here, sir, is a list of clerks for your department?" If the Secretary should reply, as did the late unfortunate incumbent, "Sir, Congress has given me the power of making these appointments—I have made my selections, of men every way qualified, and in whose integrity I have the utmost confidence—the places are therefore filled." Why, sir, the President, following out the former example, would add, "Sir, I do not mean to control you in the execution of a duty confided to you by law—I leave you to act according to your own judgment in this matter—but if you do not appoint my list of clerks, you will have the goodness to walk out of office, and I will endeavor to find a successor who will be more obedient to my commands." Is it not, then, evident that the President, by the exercise of his legal power of removal, may effect a purpose subversive both of the constitution and of the law? No one can doubt that he may do so by the same summary process which he used to obtain the custody of the public money. Against this new theory of constructive power, and all its consequences, I beg leave to enter my protest, as more dangerous and alarming than foreign war, or internal commotions of the people.

Sir, I have said that the paper sent to the Senate by the President is not an executive message; it contains nothing which brings it within the rule prescribed in the constitution, regulating the intercourse between that high public functionary and the two Houses of Congress. I hold it, therefore, to be an extra-official document, and shall treat it as such.

What are the specified cases in which the President is required to make original communications to Congress? I do not mean nominations to office, but matters which concern the general welfare of the nation. They are enumerated in the constitution, article 2d, section 3d: "He (the President) shall, from time to time, give to the Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient." Now, I ask any honorable Senator to point out, if he can, a single sentence, or a paragraph, of this paper, which directly or remotely gives to Congress information of the state of the Union, or recommends to our consideration any measure which is deemed necessary or expedient? No such purpose is pretended in justification of the executive libel on this body. It is wholly vindictive and libellous in its character throughout. I, for one, sir, spurn this foul effort to cast a stigma on the purity and patriotism of this honorable body, representing, as we do, the sovereignty of the several States of the confederacy. It might be an appropriate document for the columns of a certain newspaper in this city, conducted under the eye of the Chief Magistrate, and supported by executive patronage; it is well suited to the atmosphere of the palace, and was doubtless concocted by the panders of calumny and detraction who surround the President, and sacrifice at the altar of his ambition. They flatter but to deceive the venerable man whose popularity they vainly hope can be sustained under all circumstances, and they look with anxious expectation to the period when his mantle will descend on his "anointed" successor. I admonish the President to give to all such papers as this their proper destination. They may suit the taste of his official editor, and, through that medium, may meet the public gaze, and receive their merited condemnation before the tribunal of the people. I do not object to the publication of this miserable tirade against the Senate, but I will never consent that it should stain our Journals, or remain on the files of our Secretaries. It is bad enough to be slandered and calumniated by the Chief Magistrate and his servile minions, but it is still more offensive to the moral sense of mankind, when we are gravely asked to receive and promulgate to the world the libel which is aimed at the very existence of a branch of the Federal Government. What man is there who would tamely submit to the dictation of his calumniator, and make himself the instrument of his own disgrace, by circulating, under his own sanction, a libel on his character? None—no, not one. And yet this is the modest request which the President has made of the American Senate, from whose solemn decisions he has made this appeal to the people of the United States! I throw back the libel into the hands of its reckless, insinuated author, who has sent it here to insult the Senate, and assail its independent action; and let him, if he chooses, take his appeal through the corrupt medium of his prostituted press.

Mr. President: Waiving any additional remarks which might well be called for by the occasion, for the present, I shall resume my seat, after offering the motion I indicated when I rose, "That this paper, sent to the Senate by the President of the United States, be not received."

Mr. SPRAGUE rose to make a very few observations upon the extraordinary paper just read, more in grief than in anger; for whatever feelings might be excited on ordinary occasions, by such assumptions and assaults, he thought that on an occasion like the present, in relation to a document coming from such a source, and calculated to produce such an effect, if sustained, on the institutions of the country, all other feelings should be merged in those of solemn and deep regret.

The claims of executive power set forth in that document, if admitted and established, would leave no other department of this Government than a single Executive. What does the President say? He asserts that all executive power is vested in him—that he is responsible for all the acts of every public officer—that all right, authority, and power, given them by law is, and must be, vested and embodied in him, as head and fountain of all—that he stands, therefore, as the sole executive officer; all others being merged in him. In what language did he speak of the Secretary of the Treasury? "His Secretary," "One of his Secretaries." Thus the Secretary of the Treasury is designated as the Secretary of the President, and not the Secretary of the law. All the secretaries are his secretaries; the major general of the army is his major general; the captains in the navy are his captains; and all the civil officers of the Government are his officers—his instruments, as denominated in another part of this document. The forty thousand officers in the Blue Book are his officers—his instruments—his army—to do his bidding, as his creatures—knowing no law but his will. Did not this correspond with what it was known that he had said to the Philadelphia committee, as well as to others, when he spoke of this Government as "My Government!" Yes, sir, My Government! This Government is my Government, and all its officers my officers! "I am the state."

Having thus imbedded all executive power in a single individual, what does he arrogate as belonging essentially to the Executive? He claims in this document what never before was heard in this country; he had gone beyond any who ever claimed extraordinary power for the Executive when he said that, under the constitution, the President must have possession of all the public property, and all the public money!

Not content with advancing this unprecedented doctrine, this astounding claim, once, he repeats it in another form, and declares in express terms that "Congress cannot take out of the hands of the executive department the custody of the public property or money, without an assumption of executive power, and a subversion of the first principles of the constitution." He had gone farther than even his warmest friends on this floor, or in the country. What did gentlemen say, when the debate on the subject of the public deposits was going on? They told us, said Mr. S., that, although the deposits were removed, they were still subject to the control of Congress. It was insisted, by some, that the removal itself had placed the moneys under the power of Congress. It was repeated and reiterated: we were taunted with the idea that Congress might by legislation determine their possession; and now the President comes here and asserts that the constitution gives him the sole possession of the public money, and that Congress cannot take it from him. What further? After claiming all executive power, both of the purse and the sword! what further? A new source of boundless power is discovered. My friend from Mississippi [Mr. POINDRELL] had stated that the constitution gave the President no right to send his protest to Congress, and he read the clause designating on what occasions the President may communicate with the national legislature; but the gentleman did not observe the new source from whence this power was now claimed. Where did the President pretend to find the authority to send this extraordinary protest? Not to give information to Congress on the state of the Union; not to recommend any legislative measures; no, he finds his authority in his oath to defend, preserve, and protect the constitution of the United States; he distinctly claims to derive substantive power from the terms of his official oath. A claim unprecedented, astounding, unlimited, and illimitable. He is to defend, preserve, and protect the constitution. And as the Senate had passed a resolution, which, in the opinion of the Executive, violated the constitution, he conceives it to be his duty to come here and correct it. What other violations of the constitution will he undertake to correct? If the Supreme Court shall, in his opinion, transcend the constitution, will he not go there also and control them? Sir, said Mr. S., with the sword in one hand, and the purse in the other—with the possession of all executive power, and with the treasures of the nation, which he says Congress cannot divest him of, together with the right and duty, under his oath of office, to vindicate the constitution against all others, even the great co-ordinate departments, where is the limit of the President's power, or his pretensions to carry it into practical effect? He is to see that the constitution is preserved! He has told us on a former occasion, by message, that he is to support the constitution as he understands it; not as the judiciary expounds it; not as Congress declares it, but as he individually shall understand it. And now, because the Senate has passed resolutions expressive of its opinions, he comes forward and says it is in violation of the constitution; and therefore he must correct it. He asserts that it is acting judicially, and that he is not to be touched but by impeachment. Impeachment! and against the President, wielding the enormous powers which he arrogates! Does he believe any man weak enough to suppose that impeachment is any security against him? So far from being any restraint, it would effectually shield him from responsibility and animadversion, if he could thereby gag the two Houses of Congress, so that they could not either, or both, express opinions against his alarming encroachment, unless in the solemn form of an impeachment.

He assumes that the declaration of the Senate is a criminal procedure against him, and then enters into an argument to prove that it is unauthorized. He might as well assume that it was piracy, and, after calling it by a false name, reason upon it from his own assumptions. Sir, the expression of opinion on the part of the Senate, that the President had assumed powers not granted by the constitution, is said to be a judicial sentence, without notice of trial, and without the previous formalities required by the constitution; and yet this same President has heretofore denounced an act of the Senate as unconstitutional! Was that in him a judicial sentence? In an executive message of March, 1833, but a little more than a year since, he declares that a resolution of the Senate is unconstitutional, and, therefore, he would make no more nominations to certain offices. [Mr. S. then read the message.] Here, sir, is a declaration that the Senate has acted unconstitutionally; and yet, although the President may declare that we have violated the constitution in restraining his power, the Senate may not presume to express its opinions with regard to the President's seizing upon the money of the people, without being charged with having pronounced a judicial sentence without trial. Take this very document, this protest itself; is it not filled, saturated, with declarations that the Senate has violated the constitution? Is it not almost wholly denunciatory? And at the instant in the document in which he is uttering these accusations and denunciations against this body, he is making it a matter of grievous complaint that the Senate has simply expressed an opinion that he has transcended the limits of the constitution. There was a resolution introduced in the Senate some years since, similar in its principle and effect to this which is so much complained of, and yet I am not aware that the President, or any of his friends, have ever denounced it as an assumption of unconstitutional power. It was the resolution of a Senator from North Carolina, not now a member of the Senate, [Mr. BRANCH,] which I will take the liberty to read to the Senate. It is as follows:

[Mr. S. here read the preamble and resolution relative to the Panama mission.]

Here the President announced that he had accepted the invitation to take part in the Panama Congress, and that ministers would be commissioned; in consequence of which the declaration in the resolution just read was made. I am not aware that it ever was questioned that it was competent for the Senate so to express its opinion. This protest asserts that the resolution to which it relates is not legislative, nor designed as the foundation of legislation. How does the President know that? How does he know that it was not intended to lay the foundation of a bill for the restoration of the deposits? He undertakes to say that this body cannot pass a resolution for the purpose of preventing an evil precedent. Might not the Senate have said, on this occasion, that it expressed and recorded its disapprobation, lest the act of the Executive might be drawn into a dangerous precedent? Might it not be deemed important to prevent the effects of silent acquiescence in executive usurpation? We have seen how precedents to enlarge executive power are urged upon us. Silent acquiescence has been again and again construed into an approbation of executive measures, and yet the Senate is not permitted to speak; and, if they do not speak, silence is assumed to be approbation and support. If precedents were needed to sustain our course, I might cite the proceedings in relation to the Seminole war; I might also cite the resolution in the other House in relation to the Panama mission; but it is unnecessary now to dwell further upon this topic. There is one part of this protest to which it is proper that I should advert. The President has seen fit to set forth, at full length, certain legislative proceedings in particular States, which might be supposed to have a bearing on individual members of this body. He has done me the honor to refer to my vote upon this occasion, and to my having advocated the resolution, and then detailed certain proceedings of the State—no, not of the State, but of the legislature. Sir, all I need say to the tenant of the white house is, that, if the Secretary of the Treasury is claimed by him to be his Secretary, I am not his Senator. I recognise no right in the President of the United States to lecture me on my Senatorial duties, whatever power he may claim over his trembling officers, or however arbitrarily and oppressively he may control them. I am not his officer; and, so far as I am concerned at least, he shall learn that this Government is not his Government. I recognise no right in Andrew Jackson to come between me and the people I represent. It is not for him to say what opinions I shall hold, or what doctrines sustain. I yield not to his dictation; I submit not to his assaults; and I trust that my constituents, the spirited and intelligent people of Maine, will indignantly spurn his audacious interference between them and their servant. To that people alone I hold myself solemnly responsible. If, in their judgment, they shall think that I merit chastisement for believing that he had no right to seize the public treasure, or that a national bank is necessary to their prosperity, I shall submit in all humility to that chastisement from them, but from no other hand—no, not even from Andrew the First, acting monarch of the white house. The period is rapidly approaching, when, at the ballot box, in their primary assemblies, that people may express more directly than they have yet done, their opinion of my public services. Until this unprecedented Presidential attack, in the face of the nation, it was to me a matter of indifference whether my political life should be continued or not. I have been ready at all times to sacrifice it to my convictions of duty. The approbation of my constituents, to whom I am bound by the strong ties of duty and gratitude, would indeed be at all times inexpressibly dear; while, on the other hand, their sanction of the assumptions of executive powers, which would convert this free republic into a government of one man, would leave not a single wish to remain in its service. If they desire that their representative should be the mere supple tool of the President, to do his bidding, register his edicts, echo his royal mandates, and submit to his chastisement here, they will seek one better fitted for such a service.

That there are such to be found in some parts of the country, we have pregnant evidence around us. We see members of Congress openly avowing that they were elected as Jackson men, pledged to support all his measures, reserving to themselves no exercise of reason or judgment, or conscience or knowledge. I was not elected as Jackson's man; I am not his man; I am no man's man. I was elected to perform my legislative functions according to my own convictions of duty, after the most mature and deliberate reflection; and I have done so—I have sought no personal aggrandizement; I have not bowed the knee to Baal; and I will not now submit to this new prerogative of Presidential animadversion. I am aware that the President disclaims having referred to the acts of these State legislatures, and the votes of Senators here, for any other purpose than as a mere matter of history—merely as a chronicler of the times. He has selected these particular portions of modern history, not with any view of assailing a co-ordinate branch of the Government; not with a purpose of attacking particular members, or endeavoring to hold them up in array against their State legislatures—oh no! that would be unworthy the Chief Magistrate, and disreputable to his station; but these selections are made merely as matter of taste, or as specimens of his style as an historian. It is merely because they belong to history. What a pity it is, sir, that he should not have given us some other specimens of historical writing—some narrative of facts, not quite familiar to the public; for these which he has selected are the same which have appeared, almost daily for the last three months, in the vituperative columns of the official organ. Would it not have been as well, sir, if he had given us something of the secret history of those resolutions, the source from which they emanated, the initiated few to whom they were first communicated, the caucuses in which they were decreed, and all the modus operandi by which private judgment was subdued by executive and party discipline? This would, indeed, have enlightened the public, and aided their understanding of his favorite selections of modern history. It might have furnished us, too, with much curious reading if he had chronicled the proceedings of his upper and nether cabinets. But I take leave of the historian.

The President, after making his onset upon this body, and arrogating to himself extraordinary and unlimited powers, attempts to enlist the sympathies of the public under the baseless pretext that the resolution of the Senate assailed his private character. He dwells on his great public services, and pronounces his own eulogium. It is the old expedient. Thus has it been in all ages when the successful warrior thirsts for supreme dominion. He appeals to the people, recurs to his past services, points to his wounds, to the dangers he has braved, the victories he has achieved, denounces those who would expose his ambition and resist his encroachments as enemies and calumniators—and appeals to the dear people, if they can refuse any thing to such an injured benefactor. Will they not, from gratitude and sympathy, crush the constitution, and permit him to rule as an uncontrolled master?

There is a closing sentiment in this extraordinary document, in which I most cordially concur. It is, that government ought to be known only by the blessings it diffuses; like the dews of heaven, it should be seen and felt only in the freshness and beauty which it spreads over the fair surface of creation. And how is "my government" now seen and felt? Look abroad upon this wide-extended land—see its green fields withered by the blast of oppression—the bread of industry snatched from the mouths of labor—hear the piercing cries of widows and orphans—the supplications, the execrations, which daily and hourly come up to us from all classes, and occupations, and pursuits, upon that heartless and iron-handed despotism, which has struck down their prosperity, blasted their hopes, crushed them to the earth, and there still holds them in torture and agony, in its unrelenting and unrelaxing grasp—and then hear the arbitrary author of all this wide-spread ruin and heart-rending misery, calmly all us that government should be, like the dews of heaven, seen and felt only in the beauty and freshness which it diffuses!

Such is his theory, and such his practice! It is another illustration with what effrontery iron-hearted oppression can put forth pretensions to mildness and benignity!

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN next addressed the Senate as follows: Mr. President, while I retain any respect for myself, or just regard for the sacred trusts committed to our care, I cannot consent to receive this document. It is a most extraordinary proceeding, and will form an era in American history. Here, sir, while the country is groaning under the consequences of a rash executive experiment—while banks are breaking all around us, the busy hum of cheerful industry silenced, and labor in absolute want of employment—all the bitter fruits of executive interference with public credit—when the cries for relief come up in daily supplication—when the people had a right to expect some alleviation of their distresses from this administration, what do we hear? A lecture of an hour and a half, read to the Senate of the United States, or daring to question the authority under which this blow to our prosperity has been inflicted! Sir, I am opposed to the reception of the paper under every aspect. Instead of preserving harmony among the co-ordinate departments of the Government, its direct and immediate effect will be, to interrupt it. It cannot be otherwise. Consider, a moment, the complaints of the President.

The charge he makes is, that the resolution imputes to him a breach of the constitution of the United States, and yet, before his communication reaches its second page, he avers that the Senate have themselves violated that instrument. The whole paper is interlarded with charges of flagrant inroads. Now, sir, if we receive the paper, what else can we do but re-affirm our powers and their rightful exercise, in the subject-matter of the resolutions; and to bandy such criminations between the Senate and the Executive, will neither become our dignity nor comport with his. It will only lead to unhappy and unprofitable collisions. It is wholly without precedent or reason to sustain it.

But, in the next place, I must vote to reject this paper, because it is an unauthorized executive interference with the legislative action of the Senate of the United States. This I regard as the most serious objection: for here is to be found its greatest danger, as the first instance of a most extraordinary encroachment upon our privileges. The President, to relieve himself of this difficulty, is pleased to say that the resolution of the Senate leads to no legislative action. Sir, how does he know this? and what right has he to conjecture? We are in the midst of legislation on the very subject of the removal of the public depositories. The House of Representatives have not yet reached this branch of the case. They have resolved that the United States Bank should not be re-chartered, and that the depositories should not be restored; but whether the removal was lawful, or for satisfactory reasons, they have not determined. When the Secretary reports his reasons to Congress, and when the President informs us that his interference induced the removal of the depositories, have we no right to pronounce his interference to be unauthorized, and the Secretary's reasons insufficient? The President, in his message in December last, distinctly and officially informed us of his interference with the public moneys—and the conduct of the Secretary of the Treasury is directly traced to executive advice and control—and pray, sir, have the Senate no right to pronounce an opinion upon this, as well as all other matters, contained in that message? Mr. President, what are we coming to? Are we to be lectured, and our conduct made the subject of executive commentary, in the known course of our deliberations?

Why, sir, on the single ground of the construction lately given by an honorable Senator from Virginia, [Mr. LEXLIE,] legislative action is not only probable, but certain: that the Secretary's reasons must be approved and confirmed, by both Houses of Congress, or his act stands without legal warrant. And yet we have the Executive stepping in between us and our future deliberations, and reading off his views of our constitutional powers and duties. Sir, it would have been well for him, in charity, to have deemed our views of these great interests, the result of conscientious convictions.

And quite as unsatisfactory is the power of removal claimed by the President, over the heads of departments. He relies upon a legislative construction of this disputed point, in 1789. But let it be remembered, that the general power of removal in the President was not the matter brought into debate on the late resolutions of the Senate; but we insisted on this specific proposition, that, when the act of Congress put the public moneys under the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, the President did not possess the power of interfering with the full and free exercise of that discretion; much less to substitute his own will for the opinion and conscience of the Secretary.

And, lastly: I object to this paper, because the resolution has, at least, this attribute—it is, as the President charges it to be, an official rebuke of his conduct. I am willing, sir, to rest my vote on that alone. I maintain, that we have the right to administer official rebuke for every encroachment of the executive department, and for every step that power may argue into plausible countenance of its grasping pretensions. It is our solemn duty to the constitution and the country, to give the warning at every such interference. These are the prominent reasons wherefore I cannot receive this paper.

The President has been pleased to introduce into this document a copy of the preamble and resolutions of the legislature of New Jersey, instructing her Senators. He, however, disclaims all questioning of our motives or conduct; calls it matter of history. Sir, it is unworthy of the Chief Magistrate to become the chronicler of the times. Grant the right to give the instructions, what has the President to do in the matter? If four Senators have, against such instructions, declared the act of the President to be unconstitutional; if they have ventured all the consequences of unpleasant collisions at home; if they have resolved to act on their own judgments, and repose on the future approbation of the people, sir, it evinces how deep and pervading must have been their convictions of high and sacred duty, in declaring the late act of the President a dangerous encroachment. One word on these legislative instructions.

I wish I had near me the resolutions of a part of the people of my State, lately adopted. They contain, in my humble judgment, the true doctrine. They resolved, that the members of the State legislature at home, and of the Congress here, are alike servants of the people; deny that servants can instruct servants, and that, least of all, can they accord to the domestic legislators the right of instructing members of Congress as to their more extensive public duties.

This I believe to be the pure democratic spirit of our constitution. The people are represented by the State and National departments of Government. They intrust the State government with one great class of interests—and the National with another and more general class. We, in Congress, and our State representatives, are responsible, not to each other, but both to the people. And we, therefore, are not to receive orders from the legislature, nor to send instructions to them. Sir, I have, in the late acts of the Executive and the course of those who endeavor to sustain him, learned much of what never was democracy—the exposition that I have just attempted, I believe to be of its sound and pure doctrines, and by such lights I shall be guided.

SENATE.]

President's Protest.

Mr. President: The people of New Jersey feel themselves to be misrepresented by the late legislature, in their instructions. Whether this be the judgment of the majority, must await the results of future trial, and I cheerfully leave it to that investigation.

Mr. BENTON rose, and said that the public mind was now to be occupied with a question of the very first moment and importance, and identical in all its features with the great question growing out of the famous resolutions of the English House of Commons in the case of the Middlesex election in the year 1768, and which engrossed the attention of the British empire for fourteen years before it was settled. That question was one in which the House of Commons was judged and condemned, for adopting a resolution which was held by the subjects of the British crown to be a violation of their constitution, and a subversion of the rights of Englishmen: the question now before the Senate, and which will go before the American people, grows out of a resolution in which he (Mr. B.) believed that the constitution had been violated—the privileges of the House of Representatives invaded—and the rights of an American citizen, in the person of the President, subverted. The resolution of the House of Commons, after fourteen years of annual motions, was expunged from the Journal of the House; and he pledged himself to the American people to commence a similar series of motions with respect to this resolution of the Senate. He had made up his mind to do so without consultation with any human being, and without deigning to calculate the chances or the time of success. He rested under the firm conviction that the resolution of the Senate, which had drawn from the President the calm, temperate, and dignified protest, which had been read at the table, was a resolution which ought to be expunged from the Journal of the Senate; and if any thing was necessary to stimulate his sense of duty in making a motion to that effect, and in encouraging others after he was gone, in following up that motion to success, it would be found in the history and termination of the similar motion which was made in the English House of Commons to which he had referred. That motion was renewed for fourteen years—from 1768 to 1782—before it was successful. For the first seven years, the lofty and indignant majority did not condescend to reply to the motion. They sunk it under a dead vote as often as presented. The second seven years they replied; and at the end of the term, and on the assembling of a new Parliament, the veteran motion was carried by more than two to one; and the gratifying spectacle was beheld of a public expurgation, in the face of the assembled Commons of England, of the obnoxious resolution from the Journal of the House. The elections in England were septennial, and it took two terms of seven years, or two general elections, to bring the sense of the kingdom to bear upon their representatives. The elections of the Senate were sexennial, with intercalary exits and entrances, and it might take a less, or a longer period, he would not presume to say which, to bring the sense of the American people to bear upon an act of the American Senate. Of that, he would make no calculation; but the final success of the motion in the English House of Commons, after fourteen years' perseverance, was a sufficient encouragement for him to begin, and doubtless would encourage others to continue, until the good work should be crowned with success, and the only atonement made, which it was in the Senate's power to make, to the violated majesty of the constitution, the invaded privileges of the House of Representatives, and the subverted rights of an American citizen.

In bringing this great question before the American people, Mr. B. should consider himself as addressing the calm intelligence of an enlightened community. He believed the body of the American people to be the most enlightened community upon earth; and, without the least disparagement to the present Senate, he must be permitted to believe that many such Senates might be drawn from the ranks of the people, and still leave no dearth of intelligence behind. To such a community—in an appeal, on a great question of constitutional law, to the understandings of such a people—declamation, passion, epithets, opprobrious language, would stand for nothing. They would float, harmless and unheeded, through the empty air, and strike in vain upon the ear of a sober and dispassionate tribunal. Indignation, real or affected; wrath, however hot; fury, however enraged; asseverations, however violent; denunciations, however serious, will avail nothing. Facts—inexorable facts—are all that will be attended to; reason, calm and self-possessed, is all that will be listened to. An intelligent tribunal will exact the respect of an address to their understandings; and he that wishes to be heard in this great question, or being heard, would wish to be heeded, will have occasion to be clear and correct in his facts; close and perspicuous in his application of law; fair and candid in his conclusions and inferences, temperate and decorous in his language; and scrupulously free from every taint of vengeance and malice. Solemnly impressed with the truth of all these convictions, it was the intention of himself, (Mr. B.) whatever the example or the provocation might be—never to forget his place, his subject, his audience, and his object—never to forget that he was speaking in the American Senate, on a question of violated constitution and outraged individual right, to an audience comprehending the whole body of the American people, and for the purpose of obtaining a righteous decision from the calm and sober judgment of a high-minded, intelligent, and patriotic community.

The question immediately before the Senate was one of minor consequence; it might be called a question of small import, except for the effect which the decision might have upon the Senate itself. In that point of view, it might be a question of some moment; for, without reference to individuals, it was essential to the cause of free governments, that every department of the Government, the Senate inclusive, should so act as to preserve to itself the respect and the confidence of the country. The immediate question was, upon the rejection of the President's message. It was moved to reject it—ye reject it, not after it was considered, but before it was considered! and thus to tell the American people that their President shall not be heard—should not be allowed to plead his defence—in the presence of the body that condemned him—neither before the condemnation, nor after it! This is the motion, and certainly no enemy to the Senate could wish it to miscarry. The President, in the conclusion of his message, has respectfully requested that his defence might be entered upon the Journal of the Senate—upon that same Journal which contains the record of his convictions. This is the request of the President. Will the Senate deny it? Will they refuse this act of sheer justice and common decency? Will they go further, and not only refuse to place it on the Journal, but refuse even to suffer it to remain in the Senate? Will they refuse to permit it to remain on file, but send it back, or throw it out of doors, without condescending to reply to it? for that is the exact import of the motion now made! Will Senators exhaust their minds, and their bodies also, in loading this very communication with epithets, and then say that it shall not be received? Will they receive memorials, resolutions, essays, from all that choose to abuse the President, and not receive a word of defence from him? Will they continue the spectacle which had been presented here for three months—a daily presentation of attacks upon the President from all that choose to attack him, young and old, boys and men—attacks echoing the very sound of this resolution, and which are not only received and filed here, but printed also, and referred to a committee, and introduced, each one, with a lauded commentary of set phrase? Are the Senate to receive all these, and yet refuse to receive from the object of all this attack one word of answer? In this point of view—as a question concerning the Senate itself, it may become material to the Senate, in a country and in an age when no tribunal is too high for public opinion to reach it, it may become material to the Senate, in such a country and such an age, to reject and throw out of doors the calm and temperate defence of the President, in the midst of the reception of a thousand memorials and resolutions condemning him for the very act which he is not allowed to defend. Is he to be the only citizen who is not to be heard by the Senate? Him whom it seems to be lawful for every one whose education and manners qualifies him for the application of billingsgate rhetoric, to lavish it upon him. Rejected or not, that communication cannot be secreted from the eyes of the American people. It has been read, and will be printed. An independent press will carry it to the extremities of the country, and hand it down to succeeding generations. It will be compared with speeches delivered for three months in this Capitol, against this President, and an enlightened and upright community will decide between the language of the defence, and the language of the accusation; between the temper of the accusers, and the temper of the accused; between the violent President who has violated the constitution and the laws, and the meek and gentle Senators who have sat in judgment upon him for it. The people will see these things—will compare them together—will judge for themselves; and that judgment, in this free and happy land, will be the final and supreme award, from which there is no appeal.

The great question, Mr. B. said, which was to go before the American people, and to claim from them that intense and profound consideration which the English people gave to the conduct of the House of Commons in regard to the Middlesex election, is the constitutionality of the Senate's conduct in adopting a resolution which condemned the President for a violation of the laws and of the constitution of his country. It was the conduct of the Senate which would now be on trial, and that conduct deserved to be tried, and as far as it depended upon him, should be tried, upon the facts of the case alone—upon the facts which our Journal contains—upon the resolutions as offered, and adopted, here—upon the authentic speeches which the supporters of these resolutions have published to the world, and which show the sense in which they understood the proceeding which they carried on. The proceeding he, Mr. B., held to be an impeachment, without the forms of an impeachment—a conviction, without the form of a trial—a sentence of condemnation for a high crime and misdemeanor against the Chief Magistrate of the republic, without evidence, without hearing, without defence, without the observance of a single form prescribed for the trial of impeachments; and this by the very tribunal which is bound to try the formal impeachment for the same matter, if duly demanded by the general inquest of the nation in their Hall of Representatives. This was the question which the country would have to try, and in the trial of which, furious passion, reckless denunciation, or even audacious assertion, will stand for nothing. The record! the record! will be the evidence which the country will demand. The facts! the facts! will be the data which they require! The speeches! the speeches! delivered on this floor will be the test of the spirit and intention with which these proceedings were pursued and consummated, and without animadverting upon the manner in which the President's message and protest had been received here, and which has presented such an extraordinary scene in the American Senate, he should proceed to lay before the people the authentic evidence, in the calmest manner, which it will be their business to weigh in the formation of their opinions on this momentous subject. The first evidence which he should submit, was the series of resolutions which were presented to the Senate, before one could be framed which could unite the votes of the 26 Senators who finally voted together in the adoption of one of them. He said he should present the series of these resolutions, for in the metamorphosis which they underwent, there was much for anxious reflection; the first one containing specifications, which were omitted in the second and third; while the second and third notoriously rested upon the specifications omitted, and which could not be retained on the face of the record!

Mr. B. then read the resolution at first offered by Mr. CLAY at the commencement of the debate. It was in the following words:

Resolved, That by dismissing the late Secretary of the Treasury, because he would not, contrary to his sense of his own duty, remove the money of the United States in deposit with the Bank of the United States and its branches, in conformity with the President's opinion, and by appointing his successor to effect such removal, which has been done, the President has assumed the exercise of a power over the Treasury of the United States not granted to him by the constitution and laws, and dangerous to the liberties of the people."

He then read the resolution as amended, or altered, by the same gentleman, and offered again to the Senate towards the close of the debate. It was as follows:

Resolved, That in taking upon himself the responsibility of removing the deposits of the public money from the Bank of the United States, the President of the United States has assumed the exercise of a power over the Treasury of the United States not granted to him by the constitution and laws, and dangerous to the liberties of the people."

He then read the third edition, revised, amended, and altered, of the same resolution, as finally submitted to the Senate by the original mover, and adopted by the vote of the Senate:

Resolved, That the President, in the late Executive proceedings in relation to the public revenue, has assumed upon himself authority and power not conferred by the constitution and laws, but in derogation of both."

Mr. B. then remarked upon the alteration which these resolutions had undergone, and begged it to be well remembered that none of these alterations were amendments made by the Senate, but were the voluntary and successive changes introduced by the mover himself. He remarked, first, upon the nature of these changes; secondly, upon the design which induced them; and thirdly, upon the effect of making them. The first change consisted in dropping the specification on which the general charge of violating the laws and the constitution rested, and retaining the formal impeachment conclusion, of dangerous to the liberties of the people. The second change consisted in the omission of the specification, and in the suppression of that regular impeaching clause—dangerous to the liberties of the people! Now, said Mr. B., when were these alterations made? Certainly it was after the objection had been fully taken in the Senate that this resolution contained impeachable matter! It was after the original resolution had been denounced as a virtual impeachment of the President of the United States, and after the suppressed passages had been pointed out as proving and identifying the impeachment character of the resolution. It was after all this that the alterations were made. Having shown the time when the alterations were made, Mr. B. next showed the design with which they must have been made; and that evidently was to get rid of the criminal aspect of the proceedings, and to avoid a trial before the people on those specifications, on which, possibly, the 26 could not unite here, nor go to trial upon any where! He remarked, in the third place, upon the effect produced in the character of the resolution, and affirmed that it was nothing. He said that the same charge ran through all three. They all three imputed to the President a violation of the constitution and laws of the country—of that constitution which he was sworn to support, and of those laws which he was not only bound to observe himself, but to cause to be faithfully observed by all others. A violation of the constitution and of the laws, Mr. B. said, were not abstractions and metaphysical subtleties. They must relate to persons or things. The violations cannot rest in the air; they must afflict themselves to men or to property; they must connect themselves with the transactions of real life. They cannot be ideal and contemplative. In omitting the specifications relative to the dismissal of one Secretary of the Treasury, and the appointment of another, what other specifications were adopted or substituted? Certainly none! What others were mentally intended? Surely none! What others were suggested? Certainly none! The general charge then rests upon the same specification, and so completely is this the fact, that no supporter of the resolutions has thought it necessary to make the least alteration in his speeches which supported the original resolution, or to say a single additional word in favor of the altered resolution as finally passed. The omission of the specification is then an omission of form and not of substance; it is a change of words and not of things; and the substitution of a derogation of the laws and constitution, for dangerous to the liberties of the people, is a still more flagrant instance of change of words without change of things. It is tautologous and nonsensical. It adds nothing to the general charge, and takes nothing from it. It neither explains it nor qualifies it. In the technical sense it is absurd; for it is not the case of a statute in derogation of the common law, to wit, repealing a part of it; in the common parlance understanding it is ridiculous, for the President is not even charged with defaming the constitution and the laws; and, if he was so charged, it would present a curious trial of scandalum magnatum for the American Senate to engage in. No! said Mr. B., this derogation clause is an expletion! It is put in to fill up! The regular impeaching clause of dangerous to the liberties of the people, had to be taken out. There was danger, not to the people certainly, but to the character of the resolution, if it staid in. It identified that resolution as an impeachment, and, therefore, constituted a piece of internal evidence which it was necessary to withdraw; but in withdrawing which, the character of the resolution was not altered. The charge for violating the laws and the constitution still stood; and the substituted clause was nothing but a stopper to a vacuum—additional sound without additional sense, to fill up a blank and round off a sentence.

After showing the impeaching character of the Senate's resolution, from its own internal evidence, Mr. B. had recourse to another description of evidence, scarcely inferior to the resolutions themselves, in the authentic interpretations of their meaning. He alluded to the speeches made in support of them, and which had resounded in this chamber for three months, and were now circulating all over the country in every variety of newspaper and pamphlet form. These speeches were made by the friends of the resolution to procure its adoption here, and to justify its adoption before the country. Let the country then read, let the people read, what has been sent to them for the purpose of justifying these resolutions which they are now to try! They will find them to be in the character of prosecution pleadings against an accused man, on his trial for the commission of great crimes! Let them look over these speeches, and mark the passages; they will find language ransacked, history rummaged, to find words sufficiently strong, and examples sufficiently odious, to paint and exemplify the enormity of the crime of which the President was alleged to be guilty. After reading these passages, let any one doubt, if he can, as to the character of the resolution which was adopted. Let him doubt, if he can, of the impeachable nature of the offence which was charged upon the President. Let him doubt, if he can, that every Senator who voted for that resolution, voted the President to be guilty of an impeachable offence—an offence, for the trial of which this Senate is the appointed tribunal—an offence which it will be the immediate duty of the House of Representatives to bring before the Senate, in a formal impeachment, unless they disbelieve in the truth and justice of the resolution which has been adopted.

Mr. B. said there were three characters in which the Senate could act, and every time it acted it necessarily did so in one or the other of these characters. It possessed executive, legislative, and judicial characters. As a part of the executive, it acted on treaties and nominations in office; as a part of the legislative, it assisted in making laws; as a judicial tribunal, it decided impeachments. Now, in which of these characters did the Senate act when it adopted the resolution in question? Not in its executive character, it will be admitted; not in its legislative character, it will be proved; for the resolution was, in its nature, wholly foreign to legislation. It was directed, not to the formation of a law, but to the condemnation of the President. It was to condemn him for dismissing one Secretary, because he would not do a thing, and appointing another that he might do it; and certainly it was not matter for legislation; for Mr. Sumner could not be restored by law, nor Mr. Taney be put out by law. It was to convict the President of violating the constitution and the laws; and surely these infractions are not to be amended by laws, but avenged by trial and punishment. The very nature of the resolution proves it to be foreign to all legislation; its form proves the same thing; for it is not joint, to require the action of the House of Representatives, and thus ripen into law; nor is it followed by an instruction to a committee to report a bill in conformity to it. No such instruction could even now be added without committing an absurdity of the most ridiculous character. There was another resolution, with which this must not be confounded, and upon which an instruction to a committee might have been bottomed; it was the resolution which declared the Secretary's reasons for removing the deposits to be insufficient and unsatisfactory, but no such instruction has been bottomed even upon that resolution; so that it is evident that no legislation of any kind was intended to follow either resolution, even that to which legislation might have been appropriate, much less that to which it would have been an absurdity. Five months have elapsed since the resolutions were brought in. In all that time there has been no attempt to found a legislative act upon either of them; and it is too late now to assume that the one which in its nature and in its form is wholly foreign to legislation, is a legislative act, and adopted by the Senate in its legislative character. No! This resolution is judicial; it is a judgment pronounced upon an imputed offence; it is the declared sense of a majority of the Senate, of the guilt of the President of a high crime and misdemeanor. It is, in substance, an impeachment—an impeachment in violation of all the forms prescribed by the constitution—in violation of the privileges of the House of Representatives—in subversion of the rights of the accused; and the record of which ought to be expunged from the Journal of the Senate.

Mr. B. said, the selection of a tribunal for the trial of impeachments was felt, by the convention which framed the constitution, as one of the most delicate and difficult tasks which they had to perform. Those great men were well read in history, both ancient and modern, and knew that the impeaching power—the usual mode for trying political men for political offences—was often an engine for the gratification of factious and ambitious feelings. An impeachment was well known to be the beaten road for running down a hated or successful political rival. After great deliberation—after weighing all the tribunals, even that of the Supreme Court—the Senate of the United States was fixed upon as the body which, from its constitution, would be the most impartial, neutral, and equitable, that could be selected, and with the check of a previous inquisition, and presentment of charges by the House of Representatives, would be the safest tribunal to which could be confided a power so great in itself, and so susceptible of being abused. The Senate was selected; and to show that he had not overstated the difficulties of the convention in making the selection, he would take leave to read a passage from a work which was canonical on this subject, and from an article in that work which was written by the gentleman whose authority would have most weight on this occasion. He spoke of the Federalist, and of the article written by Gen. Hamilton on the impeaching power:

“A well-constituted court for the trial of impeachments is an object not more to be desired than difficult to be obtained, in a government wholly elective. The subjects of its jurisdiction are those offences which proceed from the misconduct of public men; or, in other words, from the abuse or violation of some public trust. They are of a nature which may, with peculiar propriety, be denominated political, as they relate chiefly to injuries done immediately to society itself. The prosecution of them, for this reason, will seldom fail to agitate the passions of the whole community, and to divide it into parties more or less friendly or inimical to the accused. In many cases, it will connect itself with the pre-existing factions, and will enlist all their animosities, partialities, influence and interest, on one side or on the other; and, in such cases, there will always be the greatest danger that the decision will be regulated more by the comparative strength of parties, than by the real demonstrations of innocence or guilt. The delicacy and magnitude of a trust which so deeply concerns the political reputation and existence of every man engaged in the administration of public affairs, speak for themselves. The difficulty of placing it rightly in a government resting entirely on the basis of periodical elections, will as readily be perceived, when it is considered that the most conspicuous characters in it will, from that circumstance, be too often the leaders or the tools of the most cunning or the most numerous faction; and, on this account, can hardly be expected to possess the requisite neutrality towards those whose conduct may be the subject of scrutiny.

“The division of the powers of impeachment between the two branches of the legislature, assigning to one the right of accusing, to the other, the right of trying, avoids the inconvenience of making the same persons both accusers and judges; and guards against the danger of persecution from the prevalence of a factious spirit in either of those branches.”

Mr. B. said there was much matter for elucidation of the present object of discussion in the extract which he had read. Its definition of an impeachable offence covered the identical charge which was contained in the resolution adopted by the Senate against the President. The offence charged upon him possessed every feature of the impeachment defined by General Hamilton. It imputes misconduct to a public man, for the abuse and violation of a public trust. The discussion of the charge has agitated the passions of the whole community; it has divided the people into parties, some friendly, some inimical, to the accused; it has connected itself with pre-existing parties, enlisting the whole of the opposition parties under one banner, and calling forth all their animosities—all their partialities—all their influence—all their interest; and, what was not foreseen by General Hamilton, it has called forth the tremendous moneyed power, and the pervading organization of a great moneyed power, wielding a mass of forty millions of money, and sixty millions of debt; wielding the whole in aid and support of this charge upon the President, and working the double battery of seduction on one hand, and oppression on the other, to put down the man against whom it is directed! This is what General Hamilton did not foresee; but the next feature in the picture he did foresee, and most accurately describe, as it is now seen by us all. He said that the decision of these impeachments would often be regulated more by the comparative strength of parties than by the guilt or innocence of the accused. How prophetic! Look to the memorials, resolutions, and petitions, sent in here to criminate the President, so clearly marked by a party line, that when an exception occurs, it is made the special subject of public remark. Look at the vote in the Senate, upon the adoption of the resolution, also as clearly defined by a party line as any party question can ever be expected to be.

To guard the most conspicuous characters from being persecuted—Mr. B. said, he was using the language of General Hamilton—to guard the most conspicuous characters from being persecuted by the leaders or the tools of the most cunning or the most numerous faction—the convention had placed the power of trying impeachments, not in the Supreme Court, not even in a body of select judges chosen for the occasion, but in the Senate of the United States, and not even in them without an intervening check to the abuse of that power, by associating the House of Representatives, and forbidding the Senate to proceed against any officer until that grand inquest of the nation should demand his trial. How far fortunate, or otherwise, the convention may have been in the selection of its tribunal for the trial of impeachments, it was not for him, Mr. B., to say. It was not for him to say how far the requisite neutrality towards those whose conduct may be under scrutiny, may be found, or has been found, in this body. But he must take leave to say, that if a public man may be virtually impeached—actually condemned by the Senate of an impeachable offence, without the intervention of the House of Representatives, then has the constitution failed at one of its most vital points, and a ready means found for doing a thing which had filled other countries with persecution, faction, and violence, and which it was intended should never be done here.

Mr. B. called upon the Senate to recollect what was the feature in the famous court of the Star Chamber, which rendered that court the most odious that ever sat in England. It was not the mass of its enormities—great as they were—for the regular tribunals which yet existed, exceeded that court, both in the mass and in the atrocity of their crimes and oppressions. The regular courts in the compass of a single reign—that of James the Second; a single judge, in a single riding—Jeffries, on the Western Circuit—surpassed all the enormities of the Star Chamber, in the whole course of its existence. What then rendered that court so intolerably odious to the English people? Sir, said Mr. B., it was because that court had no grand jury—because it proceeded without presentment, without indictment—upon information alone—and thus got at its victims without the intervention, without the restraint, of an accusing body. This is the feature which sunk the Star Chamber in England. It is the feature which no criminal tribunal in this America is allowed to possess. The most inconsiderable offender, in any State of the Union, must be charged by a grand jury before he can be tried by the court. In this Senate, sitting as a high court of impeachment, a charge must first be presented by the House of Representatives, sitting as the grand inquest of the nation. But if the Senate can proceed, without the intervention of this grand inquest, wherein is it to differ from the Star Chamber, except in the mere execution of its decrees? And what other execution is now required for delinquent public men, than the force of public opinion? No! said Mr. B., we live in an age when public opinion, over public men, is omnipotent and irreversible!—when public sentiment annihilates a public man more effectually than the scaffold. To this new and omnipotent tribunal, all the public men of Europe and America are now happily subject. The fiat of public opinion has superseded the axe of the executioner. Struck by that opinion, kings and emperors in Europe, and the highest functionaries among ourselves, fall powerless from the political stage, and wander, while their bodies live, as shadows and phantoms over the land. Should he give examples? It might be invidious; yet all would recollect an eminent example of a citizen, once sitting at the head of this Senate, afterwards falling under a judicial prosecution, from which he escaped untouched by the sword of the law, yet that eminent citizen was more utterly annihilated by public opinion, than any execution of a capital sentence could ever have accomplished upon his name. What occasion then has the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment, for the power of execution? The only effect of a regular impeachment now, is to remove from office, and disqualification for office. An irregular impeachment will be tantamount to removal and disqualification, if the justice of the sentence is confided in by the people. If this condemnation of the President had been pronounced in the first term of his administration, and the people had believed in the truth and justice of the sentence, certainly President Jackson would not have been elected a second time; and every object that a political rival, or a political party, could have wished from his removal from office, and disqualification for office, would have been accomplished. Disqualification for office—loss of public favor—political death—is now the object of political rivalry; and all this can be accomplished by an informal, as well as by a formal impeachment, if the sentence is only confided in by the people. If the people believed that the President has violated the constitution and the laws, he ceases to be the object of their respect and their confidence; he loses their favor; he dies a political death; and that this might be the object of the resolution, Mr. B. would leave to the determination of those who should read the speeches which were delivered in support of the measure, and which would constitute a public and lasting monument of the temper in which the resolution was presented, and the object intended to be accomplished by it.

It was in vain to say there could be no object, at this time, in annihilating the political influence of President Jackson, and killing him off as a public man, with a Senatorial conviction for violating the laws and constitution of the country. Such an assertion, if ventured upon by any one, would stand contradicted by facts, of which Europe and America are witnesses. Does he not stand between the country and the bank? Is he not proclaimed the sole obstacle to the re-charter of the bank; and in its re-charter is there not wrapped up the destinies of a political party, now panting for power? Remove this sole obstacle—annihilate its influence—kill off President Jackson with a sentence of condemnation for a high crime and misdemeanor, and the charter of the bank will be renewed, and in its renewal, a political party, now thundering at the gates of the Capitol, will leap into power. Here then is an object for desiring the extinction of the political influence of President Jackson! An object large enough to be seen by all America! and attractive enough to enlist the combined interest of a great moneyed power, and of a great political party.

Mr. SOUTHARD said: Mr. President, I assure the Senate that I feel, quite sufficiently, the solemnity of the occasion on which we are called to act, without the warning of the Senator from Missouri; but I fear that I shall not be able to school myself into all the calmness which deliberate discussion demands. It would, perhaps, be better that comments on this most unexpected and extraordinary paper from the Executive, should be postponed until reflection should soften the excitement under which I acknowledge that I address you. But I cannot permit that portion of this document in which the President makes direct allusion to my own conduct, to pass without prompt notice. The President regards the resolution of the Senate as uncalled for—designed for no legislative purpose—intended to lead to no legislative action—not authorized by our legislative duties—but meant simply to express our condemnation of him—and, as an assumption of judicial power, an expression of an ex parte judicial opinion. So far as I am individually concerned, I pronounce this view of it a gross misapprehension or misrepresentation and perversion of my vote and purposes. In what situation did this subject stand, when this message was received? Its history will explain its character. When we came here, at the commencement of the session, we found the public treasure removed from the position in which it had been, for years past, under the solemn sanction of the laws of the land. It was placed where no legal provision had directed—without responsibility, and, as I believed, without safety. It was not only our duty as guardians of the public money, in our legislative capacity, to inquire into the authority by which the removal had been made, but, under the express provision of the statute, the reasons for the removal were to be given to us in our legislative capacity, that we might adjudge upon their sufficiency, and make such regulations as the public interest and the safety of the funds demanded. We could not avoid doing this without a shameful abandonment of our official trust. The reasons were given to us by the President and the Secretary. They were submitted for our decision, and we were called on either to consider their validity, or to receive them as sufficient, merely because the President had chosen to act upon them. The latter I was not prepared for. The reasons or causes were those assigned by the Secretary, with the order of the President when he took the responsibility upon himself. We investigated the reasons of the Secretary, and one of our resolutions affirms our conviction that they were not sufficient. The resolution, it is presumed no one will deny, we passed, as a part of Congress, in our legislative character. But if we had stopped there, we should not have met the whole case—there had been an immediate and direct action of the Executive; he had interfered, and the right was claimed by him, and for him, so to interfere. If he had that right, the removal was to be justified by it, so far as mere law was concerned. This right was one of immense importance—deeply affecting the very essence of our institutions.

The claim was new; as many of us believed, in the history and the theory of our Government, and tending to its absolute subversion. Yet it was boldly affirmed, and if it existed, was a shield for the act which had been performed by the Secretary. It is now again put forth, in its boldest form, in the present paper. How, then, was it possible for us to decide upon the measure—to express our opinion upon the removal of the public treasure, without considering and deciding upon the right of the Executive to command and compel the removal? It was not possible. Before we undertake to repair an evil, we must see that the evil exists. Before we attempt to restore the laws, we must decide that the laws have been violated. We had no alternative, unless we chose to evade the question, as has been elsewhere done, and, without venturing to say any thing of the past, to look only to the future disposition of the money. Sir, I could perceive no reason why I should not disapprove of an illegal act of the Executive, and had no bonds to break in doing so. I felt it my duty to pass, also, upon this point. In doing this, I acted as a member of Congress, not as a judge. How could we reach the legislation on the subject without first affirming the propriety or impropriety of the disposition which had been made of the money? It was either to be left where we found it—restored to the place from which it had been illegally taken, or some other provision made for it. The correctness of any one, and of all these courses, depended upon the propriety of the executive action—upon the right of the President to give his order. It was incorporated in every view to which the subject was exposed. We could not legislate in any form without making up an opinion upon it. The resolution which the President condemns, was the result. It was the necessary and inevitable consequence of the position in which he had placed the subject; and, if we had coincided with him in opinion, no fault would have been found with us—no absence of legislative authority would have been suggested. Then it would have been quite evident that we kept within the pale of our legislative powers.

But, sir, the resolution was not only the appropriate and necessary part of our legislative action; it was also an ordinary and common matter. It was no more than, in the first place, settling, in the form of a resolution, the sense of this body, upon the principles by which our legislative action should be guided—a course which is of frequent occurrence. And it receives its condemnation now, only because it does not fall in with the high-handed assumptions of power which have been exhibited by the Executive, in utter disregard of legal and constitutional restraints. It is not our fault, if a resolution, settling the principles of the case, casts censure upon the Executive.

But, it is a condemnation of the President. That is true. And could we disapprove the removal of the public money, without condemning the conduct of the President? Could we restore it to its old depository by law, without condemning its removal? Could we pass any law which did not fall in with his dictation, without expressing censure upon his action? Mr. President, the resolution was, in substance, an indispensable part of any legislation on the subject. And whenever and by whom ever it shall be affirmed, that it was intended for no purpose of legislation, and unconnected with it, I shall not hesitate to declare, that, in my view of the case, and upon the principles by which I was guided, the assertion is absolutely and totally unfounded. I looked to legislation, and to legislation only. Whether any law, or any action of any kind may yet result from it, depends not upon myself, but others. If I have the power, I will carry out the condemnation in a shape which shall prevent future trespasses. And I am not willing that the public should be misled by the character given to the resolution in this paper. It was no decision on impeachment—no act of judicial authority—no assumption of unlicensed power. It was a legitimate exercise of our legislative functions.

If we had not a right to pass this resolution, because it disapproves what the Executive has done, we can have no right to disapprove any other act of the Executive. Whenever he shall so violate the law that the Senate is compelled to condemn his conduct, he must go quit, and we cannot aid in repairing the law.

And, Mr. President, if we had a right to express any opinion adverse to the principles and conduct of the Executive, I am at a loss to perceive why the form of the resolution is so objectionable. It is in these words: "That the President, in the late Executive proceedings in relation to the public revenue, has assumed upon himself authority and power not conferred by the constitution and laws, but in derogation of both." Language does not furnish terms more mild to express our opinion that the act of the President was unconstitutional, and destitute of legal right. We do not charge him with usurpation—with wilful violation of the constitution. If he chooses to put that construction upon it, it can be for no fair or proper purpose. It is a mere declaration that he had not rightful authority to do the act. It was connected with the resolution upon the reasons of the Secretary, and related to the exercise of the President's authority in making the removal, and declares that that exercise of authority was unconstitutional and illegal. It admits no doubt as to its application, and conveys no other censure, than an assertion of error: it imputes no improper motive.

But, sir, this paper not only perverts the character of the resolution—it alleges that the resolution contains an imputation on the private character of the President. Is this true? or is it altogether unfounded? Read over that resolution. Is there one word—one allusion against his private character or motives?—the slightest imputation against it, either by express words, or by implication? Does he think himself so infallible, that, when we declare him in error, we necessarily declare him base and unprincipled? Or is this imputation pretended, that he may take occasion to pronounce his own eulogy and trumpet his own fame, as if he had no other trumpeter? There were personal allusions to him by individual Senators in debate; but of these he does not take notice, nor had he any right to notice them in an official communication to the Senate. He speaks of the resolution only, and his allegation in regard to it is unfounded. The Senate has made no accusation against his personal character; and when his paper shall go out, as good care will be taken by him that it shall go out promptly, the public ought not to be deceived on this point. The Senate has merely declared its opinion that this act was illegal. Is this an impeachment which will justify him in coming to us with an inflated commentary upon himself, which we are to place upon our Journals to last forever, and send out to the world with the authority of a public, official, legislative document? He reminds us, if I heard the reading correctly, that he bears upon his person enduring memorials of the contest in which our liberty was purchased. Sir, I for one am ignorant of the nature of these memorials, and should have been pleased to see some specification or description. I never saw his name in the history of the Revolution. If he and his friends have stated his age correctly, he was at that period a boy of some 14 or 16 years old. We have, it is true, heard of wounds and balls connected with his person, but we are not told that they were received at the head of a battalion or a brigade, fighting the battles of his country. He has been lauded for his blood shed; mere fiction and poetry, rather than fact—but where it was credited, it served as well as truth to excite the admiration of the ignorant and credulous. Such remarks, sir, are unpleasant to me, but they are justified by the unnecessary eulogy of himself, which he has thrust upon the Senate, and which is only fitted for an electioneering appeal to the people, to excite their sympathy in his favor, when they ought to be scrutinizing his actions, and his trespasses upon the constitution and laws of the country.

In denouncing the resolution of the Senate, the President not only perverts it into a judicial act, he asserts that the solemn decision of the people against the bank, among other causes, made it expedient and proper for the Secretary to do the act which the resolution condemns. But, sir, that decision of the people, if there be one, could have had no possible relation to the removal of the money from the bank, by executive authority. When and where has that question been decided by the people, at an election or otherwise? It has never been submitted to any portion of them, at any election, until those recent ones, in particular States, which give no very favorable omen of their ultimate approbation. The people may well be opposed to the bank, and yet not justify the claim set up, in this paper, to executive control over the Treasury; nor the violation of law, in taking it from the custody created by law and contract. But I do not perceive how the people have passed a solemn decision against the bank. Congress has not yet done it in constitutional form. Reference is doubtless intended to be made to his own election—but how does that establish the assertion? Shall we admit that all who voted for Andrew Jackson did so to put down the bank, and for no other cause? How many votes were given for “the spoils of victory?” How many for the promised reforms, which have cheated all hope and expectation, and ended in increasing the number of officers, and the expenses of administration—in making bankrupt one of the Departments, to the extent, perhaps, of a million of dollars—and rendering it doubtful whether your income will equal the ordinary wants of the nation? How many for those professed constitutional principles which have been rendered so very clear, that, if you find them asserted in one public document, you find them denied in another, and no man can tell what they are—and all are disputing about them. How many for the fiction of the revolutionary services and the blood shed? How many for “the enduring memorials upon his person?” How many for the battle of New Orleans? Take these away, and what number will remain, which were given as evidence of hostility to the bank? Quite too few to constitute “a solemn decision of the American people.”

But, Mr. President, not only does this paper inaccurately represent our resolution; it descends to a criticism on the conduct of individual Senators in voting for it. It recites at large, and in words, the proceedings and instructions of three of the States, and those of one of them relating to other matters unconnected with this question; and he informs us, that, if four of the Senators had obeyed the instructions given to them, the vote of disapprobation would have been but 22. I, sir, am one of the New Jersey Senators to whom he refers, and must be permitted to say, that I regard his attack as a gross and impertinent interference between me and my constituents—as an unauthorized intrusion into the relations between us. What has the President of the United States to do with the obedience or disobedience of a Senator to the instructions which he may receive from the people. Who constituted him judge of the one, or guardian of the other? I mistake the temper of the people of New Jersey, if they do not give a prompt rebuke to such insolence. He might as well, sir, have charged me with violating my opinions and pledges, and quoted half a paragraph to prove it—and thus have imitated the organs which so often use his name and authority. The occasion justifies, if it does not require me to say, that the quotation from my remarks on the subject of instructions, which has been published, exhibits, in those who make it, a wilful purpose to deceive the public. It is taken from my remarks when I entered on the duties of Chief Magistrate of the State. I was alluding to the duties of the legislative agents of the people, State and Federal—of the obligation of those agents to act in conformity with the sentiments of the people, and to be controlled by them; and explicitly declared, that, as such agents in the State, they had no right to control and direct the agents of the people in their duties here—that they could not possess such right, unless it was so written in their constitution, and there I did not find it.*

*Extract from Inaugural Address to the legislature of New Jersey, 23d October, 1832.

“But the people of New Jersey, by themselves, or through their representatives here, and to their representatives there, have the right, and are bound by duty to themselves, to convey

Sir, it is difficult to give credit to the declaration, that the instructions of these three States were incorporated into this executive paper, solely as matter of history, and to develop the principles and interests involved in the proceedings of the Senate. Why as matter of history, should they be placed there? How do they develop the principles and interests involved in the conduct of the Executive, or in the resolution which disapproves that conduct? Another purpose is much more apparent. Mr. President, I expressed an apprehension that the excitement, which this paper has created, would endanger the deliberation which it demands. I feel that it is so. I hope that some member, who has not taken part in the discussion, will move to lay the motion for its rejection on the table, to give time for reflection. It seems to me fraught with momentous consequences. We are engaged in discussing a subject of legislative power and duty; in deciding on measures proper to be taken upon a question which has agitated the whole nation, and seeking relief from a distress which is universal and appalling. We have to furnish an appropriate legislative remedy. Petitions have been poured in upon us from the people in every quarter, pointing out their views of this remedy, and urging its adoption. We have, as the first step, expressed our opinion of the cause of the public distress, and, while the subject is still before us, while the petitions are daily reaching us, while a bill is actually upon our table, ready to be called up for consideration, we receive this paper from the Executive, which denounces our conduct, and presumes that to purpose no legislative action. It is not, indeed, a pre-emptory command, in words, not to proceed—but it is a direct breach of our privileges as a legislative assembly—an interference which, in other countries free, would be resisted with firmness and effect. It is an imitation of men whom the Chief Magistrate of a free country ought not to imitate, and which, if unchecked, may lead, at no distant day, to disastrous consequences to our institutions. Charles insulted the Parliament of charges of sedition and turbulence; Cromwell, of corruption; the Corsican, with disregard of constitutional restraints. How far does Andrew Jackson fall below them? or fail to join their merits into one? If this body shall quietly yield to such breaches of privilege, permit its action to be arrested, halt in its duty, or be unsupported by the people, it only remains for the band of armed soldiery to enter our hall, and expel us from our seats.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, said he had hoped, from the declaration of the Senator from New Jersey, that he would school his feelings, and discuss the subject with temperance, that the Senate would have been spared the reiteration of violent denunciation, and the most abusive epithets applied to the Chief Magistrate of the nation. Mr. President, we have heard the President of the United States charged by a Senator in his place, be-their commands on this, as on any other interesting topic—it is their business, both to watch and to control the doings of their general agents, and, as they appointed them, so to correct their wanderings and errors. But that duty is not assigned to us. The power does not exist in us—any more than a similar power exists in the representatives of the general government to control and correct us in that which may have been intrusted to our care. It can only be so, if it be thus written in the grant—and there I do not find it.

“The proper course for State officers, is to exercise faithfully the powers given to them—and to resist encroachments upon them; but not to act as guardians, and render the acts of others, whom their common masters have deputed to perform other services connected with their rights and interests. They may not do it unless the authority has been given to them; and in our State constitution—our warrant act—no such guardianship is prescribed.”

fore an American Senate, and in the face of the world, with giving utterance to falsehoods, knowing them to be false. Sir, the veracity and honor of General Jackson are too well established, by a long life spent in his country's service, in which his truth had never been questioned, nor his honor tarnished, to be now affected even by the high authority of the Senator from New Jersey. But let us examine, Mr. President, upon what ground it is that the Senator has thought proper to bring this debasing charge against the President of the United States. Why, sir, he has stated in the message now under consideration, that the adoption of the resolution condemning him for having violated the constitution and the laws, was not designed as a foundation for legitimate action. Now sir, I put it to the Senator from New Jersey, upon his conscience as a man, and his honor as a Senator, to say whether he did or does now believe that further legislation was expected to be founded on that resolution, by those who adopted it? [Mr. SOUTHARD said he did.] Sir, this is the first intimation I have heard of any such intention. I am bound to believe the Senator, yet I can but think few, if any, here, will agree with him. For myself, sir, I never for a moment believed there was any such design. I considered it to be a political movement, and that gentlemen supposed that by this condemnatory sentence, they would shake the confidence of the people in the purity and integrity of their President—impair the weight and influence of the administration—and thus be enabled to put down political opponents, and to elevate political friends. I may have been mistaken, but this, sir, was my firm belief. Will my veracity be called in question for stating it? I presume not: and yet, sir, the President of the United States, for stating what he believed to be true—what I believe to be true—and most of those around me believe also, has been charged over and over again with wilful falsehood. I am not permitted, Mr. President, to give utterance here to the feelings of deep indignation which such a charge is calculated to excite, and I will pass over this part of the Senator's remarks with but one observation more, and that is, that the language he has felt himself justified in using, is as unusual as it is unbecoming in this body, never before indulged in, to my recollection, but by one other individual, and approved of, I trust and believe, by no one, be his political and party feelings what they may. We are told, sir, that the President has seized on this occasion to trumpet forth his own praises—to eulogize his services. Sir, attacked as he has been, as a violator of the constitution, a tyrannical usurper of powers not delegated by that instrument, for trampling under foot the rights and liberties of the people, could he, in the just pride of conscious rectitude, do less than recur to those events in his most eventful life, calculated to show most conclusively, that such early devotion to the principles of liberty, such sacrifices, privations, and perils, sustained and encountered by him in defending his country's rights, must, with every unprejudiced mind, free him from imputations as illiberal as unjust. Mr. President, it is not for me to defend Andrew Jackson against the charge of having attempted to claim credit for services never rendered. Those services are known to the whole American people—detraction itself cannot lessen them. Sir, the fame of that man will live in the grateful recollections of a republican people throughout this widely-extended empire, when the little politicians of the day shall sink into oblivion, and be remembered no more forever. Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi has said, that the receipt of this paper had filled every honorable Senator with indignation. Now, sir, I feel no such indignation; and if the Senator—

[Here Mr. POLK rose to explain. He said he did not say that every honorable Senator did feel indignant, but that he ought so to feel.]

Sir, I must be permitted to judge for myself as to what should excite my indignation; and not till I stand in need of the opinions of that Senator to regulate my feelings, on this or any other subject, shall I be in the slightest degree influenced by them. Why, sir, the Senator from Mississippi gravely complains that the President asserts the power of appointment and removal from office: and why should he not, sir? Does not the constitution expressly delegate to the President the right to nominate, and by and with the consent of the Senate, to appoint to office; and has it not been settled for more than forty years, that the absolute right of removal was also vested in the President, acted upon unquestioned under every administration, until the present time, when new light seems to have burst upon the hitherto-benighted minds of honorable Senators here, and they have all at once discovered that this power of removal from office never has existed; and that the exertion of it was a violation of the constitution of the land? Most fortunate must it be for the country, Mr. President, that we have in these our days, men within these walls, who comprehend the provisions of the constitution so much better than those who framed it, and who are determined, if practicable, to rescue that instrument from violation on the part of the present President—who has the hardihood to do what has been done by Washington, Adams, Jefferson, Madison, and all others who have heretofore discharged the executive duties of this Government. But the President has exerted the veto power vested in him by the constitution, to arrest what he on his conscience believed to be laws enacted in violation of that instrument, or calculated greatly to impair the general interest; and for this he is now arraigned as having usurped all the powers of legislation. Sir, it is somewhat amusing to see the changes produced on the minds of honorable Senators by the force of party feeling, condemning to day what yesterday met with their most hearty support. The President, by his veto on the Maysville road bill, arrested the action of the General Government on works of internal improvement—put down, as far as in him lay, the claim which had been set up, to an unlimited exercise of power over such subjects; and thus not only prevented the expenditure of nearly $100,000,000, then in progress of appropriation or contemplated on surveys then making, but, sir, by his patriotic devotion to the true principles of our Government, preserved from violation the sacred charter of our rights. How many, now in my eye, then applauded the act, who are now ready to condemn the exercise of the veto, and pronounce it a usurpation of all legislative power? How can those, Mr. President, who saw in the bill of the Senator from Kentucky for the distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, the destruction of the best interests of the new States of the West and Southwest, if not a violation of the constitution itself, condemn the exercise of the veto, which alone saved us from that ruinous measure? Or will Senators opposed to the Bank of the United States upon constitutional grounds, suffer their party feelings to lead them to the condemnation of a man who interposed the shield of that constitution to protect the country from the blighting influence of this immense moneyed institution? Executive usurpation! I firmly believe, Mr. President, we now have, and ever have had, more to fear from legislative than executive usurpation, upon the rights of the people, and in violation of the constitution. Sir, look at the tariff of 1828, laid, not for purposes of revenue, but expressly and avowedly for protection. Few will be found in the Southern section of our country who will not pronounce a tariff for protection alone, a violation of the constitution. Its withering effects upon the prosperity of that whole section, I need not depict; they are known to all who hear me. Remonstrance was vain; an inexorable majority, who were filling their pockets with the spoils, turned a deaf ear. All the influence of this much abused President—abused by those he was laboring to relieve—was exerted without effect. Message after message recommended the reduction of duties to the revenue standard. Bill after bill was introduced, prepared by the Secretary of the Treasury, under his direction, so to regulate the duties as to relieve the suffering portions of the country, and bring down the revenue to the lowest wants of the Government. Interest, regardless of the constitution, still prevailed in the legislative halls, and these just bills were defeated. Tell me not, then, that it is executive usurpation from which we have most to fear. Sir, the Senator from Maine [Mr. SERRAVALLE] urges that the claim set forth by the President in this message, leaves no power in any other department of the Government. Sir, if I understood that paper, as read by the Secretary, the Senator is altogether mistaken. I am confident he had no design to misrepresent. The power claimed, is a supervisory power, to see that the agents of the Government faithfully carry into effect the laws which may be passed for their control. This, and no more, is the extent of the claim set forth, and which now is denounced as an unheard-of assumption of power. Mr. President, the American people selected General Jackson as their President, because they believed him honest, patriotic, and possessed of a firmness of spirit, which would not be turned aside, for fear of consequences, from compelling all within the sphere of his legitimate control, to discharge their duty to that people—nor will they be induced to withdraw their confidence, however strongly he may be censured by politicians, should he continue steadily to pursue that course—for they will not be alarmed by the cry of usurpation—of tyranny—although it should come from this, or the other chamber of this building. It has been strongly urged, Mr. President, that never before, in the history of this country, has a President of the United States felt himself justified in making a communication to the Senate, complaining of the action of that body. Sir, a case precisely similar to this never has occurred—for, sir, never before has the Senate adopted a resolution condemning the President for a violation of the constitution, which he had solemnly sworn to support; and placed that sentence of condemnation on the archives of the nation, as an enduring record of his disgrace—as far at least as their act could affix that stigma on his name. But, sir, a case somewhat similar did occur at an early period, in the administration of that man whom we all delight to honor as the Father of his Country. Sir, General Washington was in the habit of coming down to the Senate, taking the seat you now occupy, and presenting his nominations for their confirmation. On one occasion it pleased the Senate to withhold its approbation from the nomination of a General Fishburn, of Savannah, Georgia; General Washington felt aggrieved; left the chair; and, on a subsequent day, made a nomination in writing, of another individual, for the same office, accompanied by a message complaining of the rejection of General Fishburn, and assigning his reasons for having nominated him. [Here Mr. KING read the message.] Sir, on this occasion General Washington felt himself authorized to send a communication to the Senate, to justify himself in making a nomination which they had rejected; not to procure the favorable action of that body upon the individual named—for he was not nominated, but another in his place; but to free himself from the implied censure which such rejection was supposed to convey. But now, sir, when the President attempts to free himself from the unprecedented censure passed upon him by the Senate, by stating the grounds of his action, with the reasons which influenced him, and asks that it shall be placed on the same Journal on which the resolution of his condemnation stands, he is met with a degree of vituperation and denunciation which has astonished, if it has not disgusted, the most of those who heard it.

[SENATE.]

Mr. President, I am obliged to the Senator from Maine, for calling our attention to another message, which he considers insulting to the Senate. What, sir, gave rise to that communication? A resolution adopted by the Senate restricting the constitutional power of the President, in nominating for office. It was adopted without reflection, at the instance of a Senator from Mississippi, with the design to protect the new States from having persons from other States sent within their limits to hold offices which he and most of us supposed citizens of the State where the office was located could be found as well qualified to discharge the duties of. The motive was a good one, but the restriction was in derogation of the constitutional power vested in the President. He so viewed it, and determined not to be thus deprived of his legitimate right—hence the message, which the Senator has declared to be an insult to the Senate. Why, sir, the Senate, after re-examination, coincided in opinion with the President, and repealed the obnoxious resolution. I now ask the Senator if he will risk his reputation, as a sound constitutional lawyer, by denying that the President was right in refusing to be so restricted? Sir, a resolution offered by a Senator from North Carolina, (not now a member of this body,) pending the famous Panama question, has been read to justify the Senate in adopting this. Mr. President, they are entirely dissimilar. There, the then President had made known his intention to institute a new mission, without the advice of the Senate, or approbation of Congress; the Senate, as his constitutional advisers, believed it their duty to interpose and prevent the adoption of a measure then in a train for execution, opposed, as they believed, by the plainest principles of the constitution. It was advice, sir, salutary advice, not censure. Can it be said of this resolution, charging the President with a violation of the constitution and of law? Sir, the Senator from Maine boasted that he is no Jackson man—that he will not bow the knee to Baal. Sir, this is the first time the friends of the administration have been taunted with the subserviency to Executive views. I have heretofore disdained to notice it. Sir, I was known to those who placed me here, as the personal and political friend of General Jackson. I have given to his administration a firm and zealous, if not able support—whereas, in my judgment, the measures proposed were calculated to advance the general interests—but, sir, it has been my fate, in the discharge of what I conceived to be my duty, to stand arrayed against one of his most important measures. I allude to the bill of the last session, known generally as the Force Bill. Was subserviency manifested there? Sir, on other occasions I have differed from the views of the President, and frankly made known to him that difference—and little do those know him who suppose that thus to act, either lessens his respect or diminishes his friendship for the individual. No, sir, high-minded and honorable himself, he fully appreciates these qualities in others—base subserviency can never win his respect nor command his favor. Sir, the Senator from Maine informs us, he obeys no mandates. So it seems, sir, whether here or elsewhere—here, it is not desired; elsewhere it may be expected. But, sir, I leave the gentleman to settle it with those who may conceive they have a right to command. Mr. President, this communication has been stigmatized by the Senator from Mississippi, and others, as a feeble, miserable production, not calculated to produce any effect on the country. If such, sir, be its character, why is it so violently assailed before it has made its appearance in the Senate? Why is the proposition now made to refuse its reception? Does it not seem as if gentlemen were conscious that the resolution they have adopted will not bear the test of fair examination? But, sir, be that as it may, I am surprised at the pretension of the Senator from Mississippi. Has he not suffered his “indignant feelings,” as he terms them, to hurry into an indiscretion, which his vigorous intellect will condemn? Sir, this paper cannot be smothered; the very attempt to do so, will give to it an increased importance in the eyes of the country. It will go forth—it will be read with avidity—ours are an intelligent, reflecting, sober people—denunciation and abuse of the President, even by those occupying seats in this august assembly, will not turn them aside from a calm examination of the whole matter. Yes, sir, not only this paper, but the resolution also will be scrutinized—the motive for its adoption will be canvassed and understood; and gentlemen will find that they must abide the decision—there can be no escape.

Mr. LEIGH rose and said, that there was one sentiment uttered by the Senator from Missouri in which he perfectly concurred, and that was the one in which he describes the solemnity and importance of the occasion. In the presence of my God, (continued Mr. L.,) I will declare my belief, that, on the result of the question now before us, will depend the fate of this country, and of that constitution under which we have the happiness to live. Entertaining this sentiment, I will go further, and say, that there is no question settled so well as that question which is decided calmly and dispassionately, and that this question in particular ought to be dispassionately adopted. I feel now that I am not in a condition to discuss the subject, without giving utterance to feelings, passions, which at this moment are boiling in my bosom. I desire to avoid any such exposition. I feel the dignity of the station which I occupy as a representative of one of the independent sovereignties of this Union, and never will I do any thing in "derogation" of that dignity, using the word in a sense in which the draughtsman of the paper before us seems never to have understood it. With these sentiments, sir, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. SPRAGUE (Mr. LEIGH having withdrawn his motion to adjourn) made a short explanation in reply to Mr. KIRK, of Alabama, on the subject of the resolution adopted in executive session, concerning nominations of officers of a different State from that in which the offices were situated. That resolution, which the gentleman from Alabama seemed to think so unconstitutional, was passed, as he admitted, by an overwhelming majority, including most of those Senators who were in favor of the present Executive. He, Mr. S., had never entertained a doubt as to the constitutional power of the Senate to pass that or any other resolution. The question was not whether the appointment of an individual should be restricted to a particular place, but declaratory that appointments for an office should not be made out of the State in which the office was situated. He thought, if his memory was not treacherous, that the gentleman from Alabama himself had voted for that resolution. [Mr. KIRK: I did.] The gentleman did. He did vote for the resolution, yet he asks me if I did not think the resolution was unconstitutional.

After a few additional words on the subject of the assumption of power by the President, which were not distinctly heard, the motion to adjourn was again made by Mr. LEIGH, and agreed to.

PRINCE GEORGE'S (MD.) MEMORIAL.

Mr. KENT presented a memorial from Prince George's county, in the State of Maryland, complaining of the removal of the public deposits, and the manner in which they had been removed through the agency of the President, and praying for their restoration and the recharter of the Bank of the United States.

On presenting the above memorial, Mr. KENT addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President: I have had in my possession, for several days, a memorial which I have wished to present to the Senate, but peculiar circumstances have intervened to prevent it. I beg leave now to offer it. It comes from the adjoining county of Prince George, in the State of Maryland, and is subscribed by eight hundred persons, a decided majority of all the legal voters in the county.

These memorialists complain of the removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States; of the improper interference of the President in accomplishing it; and the consequent derangement of the currency of the country; and pray that the deposits may be restored, and the bank re-chartered.

They inform you they are planters and farmers, and that they have no connexion with the Bank of the United States. I know them well; they are my neighbors and my friends; and for intelligence, industry, enterprise, and devotion to the best interests of the country, would compare with the like number residing in any section of the United States.

These memorialists have been in the habit of relying on their own successful exertions, and this is the first time, within my recollection, that they have presented their grievances to either the General or State Government; but, like many of their fellow-citizens in other parts of the United States, they are deeply concerned at the present condition of the currency and commerce of the country. They have too much good sense not to know the dependence of one interest upon another, the intimate connexion that exists between agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, and the entire dependence of all three for prosperity, upon a sound, wholesome, and equal currency pervading every part of the country.

Anterior to the revolutionary war, we had a cruel and unnatural parental government. The king of England claimed the right, by divine authority, to tyrannize over us; he habitually refused his sanction to laws deemed salutary and necessary by us; his veto power was freely exerted against us; and the legislative bodies of the respective colonies were prorogued at pleasure, by the hiring governors of his appointment. Having freed ourselves from this transatlantic tyranny, we never expected to be involved in distress, deep distress, by the cruel and unnecessary acts of our own Government. For such may be considered the late schemes in relation to the currency of the country.

Mr. President, these memorialists know we are in a state of profound peace; that no injurious change has taken place in our foreign relations; that, on the 26th day of September last, the fatal day on which the order for the removal of the public deposits was given, the utmost prosperity prevailed throughout the country. At that time every interest was doing well; agriculture, commerce, manufactures, all prosperous; we were blessed with a currency the best under the sun, superior to that of any country I have any acquaintance with; money could have been transmitted from Maine to Orleans, great as the distance is, for a less premium, I believe, than it could have been done either from London to Edinburgh, or from Paris to Bordeaux.

Notwithstanding the existence of circumstances thus propitious, our public agents could not be influenced by that good old adage, "Let well enough alone," but they must try an experiment upon the currency of the country—a vital part of the social system—if that could be called an experiment which had before been tried and totally failed.*

* "The increased facilities of communication and inland exchanges have, within the last years, multiplied, to an extent heretofore unknown, the transactions, contracts, and responsibilities between the several cities, and between the cities and even the most remote parts of the country. The regularity with which the enormous mass of engagements resulting from these transactions spread over the whole country, and all inti-

Prince George's (Md.) Memorial.

Sir, this scheme was fully tested from 1811 to 1816. I was here, an actor in the scenes of those days, and well remember the ruinous consequences that resulted from it. The experiment made then, soon terminated in a paper currency of a description so bad that I shall not undertake to describe it. It continued to depreciate, until it became so worthless that the members of Congress refused to receive it in payment of their per diem allowance. They were paid in Treasury notes and drafts on Northern banks, where specie payments had never been discontinued, and those were sold for a premium which was pocketed by the members, whilst their constituents were obliged to receive the depreciated paper money in payment for their hard earnings. What the people individually lost, and what the Government lost, during the five years that this first experiment was going on, and which embraced the whole period of the late war, I will not attempt to estimate. We know that there is enough of the trash of that day now remaining in the public Treasury, called unavailable funds, which, with the interest added to it, would be sufficient to complete the Chesapeake and Ohio canal, the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, and the Delaware breakwater, three great and magnificent public works, intimately connected with the future prosperity of the country.*

Sir, it is known to most of those whom I have the honor to address, that the Government was obliged, during the greater part of the late war, in making their loans, to give one hundred dollars, in stock of the United States, bearing six per cent. interest, for eighty dollars of this depreciated money, worth about sixty-five dollars. On one occasion, the Government was reduced so low, that the Secretary of the Treasury was compelled to entreat an individual to obtain a loan of eighteen hundred thousand dollars, at one hundred of stock for eighty of this depreciated money, and which was to have a retrospective effect upon a previous loan; in consequence of which, it cost the people of the United States twenty-nine hundred thousand dollars, independent of interest, before it was paid off. The same individual was entreated, at the same time, to procure an additional loan of this depreciated paper money, at eight per cent., which he was unable to effect. It has been well believed that the most, if not all those losses could have been avoided, if there had been, at that time, a sound currency, such as a national bank would have given us. I know this was the opinion then, of one of the purest and wisest men that ever participated in the councils of the country.

I have thought proper, Mr. President, to allude to matters connected together, can be discharged, depends entirely on an uninterrupted continuance of the ordinary sales, payments, remittances, and credits. The whole machinery by which business, in all its various branches, is carried on, is credit extended to its utmost limits. Whatever lessens the general confidence on which credit is founded, must necessarily produce a fatal derangement and interruption in every branch of business. Some notion of the magnitude of these engagements may be formed by a view of those of the city of New York, which alone amount to five millions a day, or more than fifteen hundred millions of dollars a year. It was with this state of things, that, without any necessity or investigation, the Executive thought proper to interfere. The Bank of the United States, from its capital, and the ground it occupies, must, while it exists, act a prominent part in the commercial concerns of the country. The measures which that institution was obliged to take for its own safety, must necessarily have caused some derangements in the ordinary operations of commerce; but the fatal injury inflicted by the Executive measure, was its effect on general confidence."—Report Union Committee, written by Mr. Gallatin, p. 17.

* "We believe that the pecuniary loss sustained on the loans raised during the suspension of specie payments, and from bank failures, exceeded four millions of dollars."—Mr. Gallatin on Banks and Currency.

those facts, to show the disastrous consequences of the first experiment made by the Government to dispense with a national bank, and such will be the fate of the second. Like causes will produce like effects, to be aggravated more or less by attendant circumstances. But it is said the democratic party is in favor of this ruinous, this destructive scheme. Not so, Mr. President. Where are to be found the remaining high priests of the old democratic party, the democratic party of 1797, 1798!—not the spurious race who have assumed the name at the present day, and, without comprehending the principles connected with it, are wielding the influence derived from it, for the destruction of both the liberties and prosperity of the country.

A leading feature in the creed of the old democratic party was, "that error of opinion might be tolerated, whilst reason was left free to combat it." The modern race have stricken this from the political decalogue. Where will you find Mr. Madison, a host in himself? Where is Mr. Gallatin? They were deservedly prominent in those days. They may now be justly called the co-script fathers of the land; and are they not decidedly hostile to the mad career of the present day? Standing as it were between the living and the dead, are they not using the last exertions of expiring nature in admonishing us? Are they not giving us the benefit of their long experience, their deep researches, and their thorough knowledge of our public concerns? Yes, sir, they are duly shedding light upon difficult subjects of policy, and their opinions must and will have a strong tendency to correct the evils of the present day.

Mr. President, there is another subject connected with the removal of the deposits, of which these memorialists complain. They ascribe the act to the President, and not to the Secretary of the Treasury; and let us see how far they are sustained in this opinion by what Mr. Duane says, and by what has occurred on this floor:

Mr. Duane, in his third letter, addressed to the people of the United States, says, that "on the 30th May I reached Washington. After waiting upon the President, on the next day, I went to the Treasury Department, and took the oath of office on the 1st of June. On the evening of that day, Mr. Reuben M. Whitney called upon me at my lodgings, at the desire, as he said, of the President, to make known to me what had been done, and what was to be done, in relation to the United States Bank. He stated that the President had concluded to take upon himself the responsibility of directing the Secretary of the Treasury to remove the public deposits from the bank, and to transfer them to State banks; that he had asked the members of the cabinet to give him their opinions on the subject; that the President had said, 'Mr. Taney and Mr. Barry had come out like men for the removal'; that Mr. McLane had given a long opinion against it; that Mr. Cass was supposed to be against it, but had given no written opinion; and that Mr. Woodbury had given an opinion, which was 'yes' and 'no'; that the President would make the act his own, by addressing a paper or order to the Secretary of the Treasury; that Mr. Amos Kendall, who was high in the President's confidence, was now preparing that paper; that there had been delay, owing to the affair at Alexandria, but no doubt the President would soon speak to me on the subject; that the paper referred to would be put forth as the proclamation had been, and would be made a rallying point; that he (Mr. Whitney) had, at the desire of the President, drawn a memoir, or exposition, showing that the measure might be safely adopted, and that the State banks would be fully adequate to all the purposes of Government. He then read the exposition to me, and, as I desired to understand matters so important and so singularly presented to me, I asked him to leave the papers with me, which he accordingly did. He also read to me divers letters from individuals connected with State banks. The drift of his further observations was to satisfy me that the Executive arm alone could be relied on to prevent a renewal of the United States Bank charter!!"

Mr. Duane could not be otherwise than mortified and disgusted at this open attempt to degrade him, but listened attentively to the disclosures made to him as the plot opened. On the next evening, Mr. D. says, "Mr. Whitney called again on me, accompanied by Mr. Kendall, Fourth Auditor, a gentleman in the President's confidence, and who would give me any further explanation that I might desire, as to what was meditated in relation to the United States Bank, and who called on me because he was about to proceed to Baltimore." The next morning I waited on the President, and communicated the representations Mr. Whitney had made, and their correctness was admitted. Among other observations made by the President, he remarked "that the matter under consideration was of vast consequence to the country; that unless the bank was broken down, it would break him down; and that, if the last Congress had remained a week longer in session, two-thirds would have been secured for the bank by corrupt means, and that the like result might be apprehended at the next Congress." What a humiliating picture is here drawn by the Chief Magistrate of the legislative department of the Government! So much for Mr. Duane's letter. It fully sustains the apprehension of the memorialists. Mr. Duane finally refused to perform the act at the President's bidding. For this refusal he assigned his reasons to the President in a letter, since published to the world as a part of his fourth letter to the people of the United States, and which does equal credit to his heart and his head. It is unanswerable.

The ground taken by him, he says, was enforced by a representation from the Secretary of State with unusual ability. This paper, I hope, we shall see hereafter. Rumor says there were two other papers presented, in favor of the removal of the deposits, so remarkable for rashness, partisan zeal, and ignorance of the subject of which they treated, that they would be considered curiosities if they could be brought to light; perhaps it would be better for the reputation of the country that they never should.

Sir, the Senate knows what followed. On the 23d of September, Mr. Duane was removed from office. Three days after, his successor, Mr. Taney, signed the order for the removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States—a period so short, I should suppose, to have enabled him to remove the official rubbish necessarily left upon his table by his predecessor, suddenly removed from office, much less to have enabled him to have examined this important measure in all its bearings upon the various interests of society—a measure calculated to affect every human being in the United States, especially the laboring, the productive part of society—a measure the most important that could possibly be presented to the head of the financial department of any Government, and such a one as would have appalled a Sully, a Pitt, a Fox, a Canning, or the ablest of his predecessors. It was embraced with more avidity than would have been becoming in a juvenile county court lawyer, who was about to defend a man charged with an ordinary assault and battery. But this apparent precipitancy has been accounted for by the declarations of the Senator from Tennessee, who addressed the Senate upon this subject: with his usual characteristic independence he has disclosed the "secrets of the prison-house," and I, for one, "will take the ghost's word for a thousand pounds." He said he wished the Senate distinctly and unequivocally to understand that the removal of the deposits was the act of the President, and not of the Secretary; and we all know the confidential footing the honorable Senator is very properly upon with that high officer of Government. At the time this declaration was made, I considered it "the unkindest cut of all" at the Secretary, after the presentation of a paper purporting to contain his reasons for the performance of an act which it turns out he never performed, notwithstanding I now believe it to be the best apology the honorable Senator could possibly make for the Secretary's apparently unpardonable haste in the adoption of one of the most important measures that was ever inflicted upon a distracted and ruined country. But it has been said that Mr. Taney had given an opinion in favor of the measure, and was, therefore, prepared to act. At the time it is understood he gave this opinion, he was the law officer of the Government, and, I presume, it related exclusively to the legal part of the question. Free from duress, and he would be highly capable of giving a sound opinion on such an occasion. As to the financial matter connected with the subject, I presume he did not interfere with it. He had never turned his attention to such questions, and, therefore, would not assume the right to meddle with another department, so far as to obtrude his opinions upon the gentleman about to take upon himself the superintendence of it.

Again, Mr. President, at that time Mr. Duane had not been suspected of that contumacy which led to his expulsion, and to Mr. Taney's appointment; and, until those events occurred, if Mr. T. had stepped beyond the sphere of his office to volunteer opinions calculated to embarrass the head of another department, it would have looked too much like entering into a conspiracy to ruin one of his colleagues, that he might profit by his disgrace. Of any such conduct, I acquit him entirely; he could not be guilty of it: it is the indiscretion of his apologists that would place him in such a predicament.

The history of the country sustains me in believing that no Secretary of the Treasury ever would have given his opinion in favor of dispensing with the Bank of the United States as the fiscal agent of the Government, unless he had committed himself previously to his appointment, or it had been made the condition upon which he was to hold office.

Let him occupy the Treasury Department for one month, and acquire any degree of experience in the financial transactions of the country, and he would never voluntarily consent to abandon the facilities which the Bank of the United States has invariably afforded in the collection, safe-keeping, and transmission of the public revenue. In confirmation of my opinion, the Senate will recollect with what tenacity the fiscal agency of the Bank of the United States was adhered to by Mr. Hamilton, Mr. Gallatin, Mr. Dallas, Mr. Crawford, and Mr. Duane.*

Those gifted and disinterested men knew the value of such a public institution, and delighted to cherish it. The moment we abandon it, the public interest suffers.

* Every President of the United States, from General Washington down to the present day, approved, either directly or indirectly, some law in relation to the Bank of the United States. Mr. Jefferson approved two laws during his administration in reference to the bank, one to establish a branch bank at New Orleans, the other to punish counterfeiters of its notes; thus yielding his constitutional scruples to the promotion of the great interests of the country. Nay, in conformity with this praiseworthy feeling, he advised General Washington, at the time of the passage of the first bank bill, in an opinion then given, dated the 15th February, 1791, treating of the constitutionality of the bank, "that unless the President's mind, on a view of every thing that is urged for and against this bill, is tolerably clear that it is unauthorized by the constitution, if the pro and con. hang so even as to balance his judgment, a just respect for the wisdom of the legislature would naturally decide the balance in favor of their opinion; it is chiefly for cases where they are clearly misled by error, ambition, or interest, that the constitution has placed a check in the negative of the President."

Prince George's (Md.) Memorial.

[APRIL 18, 1834.]

Mr. Taney stands alone opposed to it, whilst acting as Secretary of the Treasury.

But, Mr. President, there are some circumstances connected with the removal of the public deposits, which must and will forever have a severe bearing upon whomsoever posterity and the future historian shall fix the deed. We be unto him on whose head shall fall the execration of a ruined community! Mr. Duane, who appears to have viewed the act with a keen and scrutinizing eye, in all its relations to the public interest, informs us, in his fifth letter, that the part of his instructions prepared for the agent who was to negotiate with the banks, which directed him to ascertain "the effect of the removal of the deposits upon the mutual relations of banks, and upon society, which, if faithfully collected, would disabuse the President's mind," was stricken out; and thus "the President would not permit his own agent to collect information that might have disabused his own mind, or instructed his cabinet, whom he affected to consult. If the information called for by the instructions, as at first proposed, had been collected, I feel satisfied (says Mr. Duane) that it would have indicated the evil consequences which followed the measures of the President." Mr. Duane further remarks, "that whether these measures, thus wantonly executed, evinced, on the part of the President, patriotism and magnanimity, or a subserviency to a selfish cabal, the public is competent to determine." What is still worse, Mr. President, those instructions, mutilated as they were, robbed of their most essential feature, to wit, an inquiry into the effect and bearing which this vital measure would likely have upon the general transactions of the country, were thrown aside, the agent informs us in his report to the Secretary of the Treasury, dated the 4th of September, 1833, and another set prepared, more congenial to his own views. Gracious God! Mr. President, was there ever before such a state of things in any age or country? Were ever the interests of a great and growing republic thus sported with? Was ever a generous, grateful, confiding people thus cajoled, thus imposed upon before?

From those disclosures one appalling fact is made evident, that there are men behind the scenes who control the high officers of Government, and who are unknown to the law, and irresponsible to the people. Your public agents are forcibly deprived of any control over their respective departments. Amos Kendall throws aside the instructions prepared for him by the Secretary of the Treasury relative to the inquiries relating to the removal of the public deposits. R. M. Whitney had, at the desire of the President, drawn a memoir or exposition, showing that the removal of the deposits might be safely made, and that the State banks would be fully adequate to all the purposes of Government. Mr. President, can this possibly be the same R. M. Whitney who makes such a sorry figure before the bank committee while sitting in Philadelphia? At that time his testimony was entirely discredited, and he made to admit that he had been a resident in Canada from 1808 to 1816, and had taken the oath of allegiance to the British Government. His residence in Canada embraced the whole period of the war, as well as the five years during which the first experiment to dispense with a national bank was going on; he was, therefore, not only exempt from the perils of the war, but free from those sacrifices which would unavoidably be produced by a depreciated paper currency, and very probably, during all that period, profiting by the misfortunes of that country which gave him birth. Mr. President, can such an individual be a fit adviser to the President of the United States? Will the people ever consent that the destinies of this great and growing republic shall be placed in such hands? He to have an active agency in involving us in our present misfortunes! It is enough to bring down the vengeance of Heaven upon us. If the President of the United States wants additional advisers, do let him resort to high-minded, honorable, intelligent men—the country abounds in them. But the bank is a monster, and must be put down! It was created by law, after ample discussion and mature deliberation, through the exertions of pure and able men, with powers sufficient, and no more, to achieve a great and important benefit to the community, to wit, the restoration of specie payments by the banks.

It accomplished its object at great cost and expense, and gave us a currency inferior to none that ever existed. Every interest prospered in consequence of this new condition of the currency, and the bank would have continued to shed its beneficial influence on all the transactions of the country, if it had been permitted to pursue its course to the end of the charter. In a moment of blind infatuation, the Executive department of the Government took a perverted view of the interests of the country, and determined to arrest its progress. Its chartered rights were violated; the public money removed from its vaults, where, but a short time before, the House of Representatives had determined it to be safe, and the bank threatened with insolvency, and we are credibly informed it is still threatened with bankruptcy by further acts of violence. Under such circumstances, the bank has been censured for curtailing its discounts: the most ordinary prudence and intelligence would have dictated such a precaution at such a time. From the 1st of October to the 1st of December last, the deposits in the United States Bank had been reduced $5,888,864 63, up to which period its circulation had only been lessened $477,266 47. In the same period the deposits in the Union Bank of Maryland had increased $298,050 06, whilst its circulation had decreased $82,158. Further returns would make this statement equally if not more favorable to the Bank of the United States. From the foregoing official statement, it will be seen at once how much more liberal the Bank of the United States was able to be than a local bank can possibly be, even when favored with the public deposits.

I have not adverted to this statement for the purpose of censuring the Union Bank. It was selected because it was in Maryland, and had a large capital. No doubt it had done all in its power to accommodate the public. It was its interest so to do. Had the Bank of the United States been permitted to pursue the even tenor of its way to the end of its charter, the community would have continued to have received the usual facilities from that institution; and, at its termination, its funds would have rapidly passed into other channels for the public accommodation. Under such circumstances, had the bank attempted to create the slightest pressure, for effect, upon the community, it would have been overwhelmed by public odium, and its future prospects prostrated.

The re-charter of the bank has been opposed in the Senate, because it would be a triumph, after what had occurred, over the President. I have a better opinion of the President than to believe that he would permit a feeling of that kind to weigh against the great interests of the country; but should it not be re-chartered, it will be a triumph over the legislative department of the Government, over the immediate representatives of the people chosen to enact the law, whilst the President has but a limited supervision over the execution of the law.

Mr. President, the bank has been represented to be dangerous to the liberties of the country. When gentlemen make this assertion, I do not doubt their sincerity; but, before I can concur in this opinion, I must believe every department of the Government, legislative, judicial, and executive, to be corrupt, to each of which the bank is amenable. At one time the foreign stockholders were to destroy the liberties of the country, but since the Manhattan Bank was selected as one of the pet banks, large proportion of the stock of which is owned by a foreign nobleman, it has put a stop to that preposterous apprehension. Now, it is the money of the bank with which the liberties of the country are to be purchased: when divided amongst our present population, it would amount to about two dollars sixty-two and one-half cents each. The people of the United States must be easily bribed, indeed, to sell their liberties for such a contemptible sum.

Mr. President, it is generally admitted that the late measure of the Executive has been an unfortunate one. That it will prove disastrous to those who suggested it, I have no doubt; that it has produced ruin and misery throughout the country, the records of the Senate furnish lamentable evidence. Then let the Executive retrace his steps: it cannot restore those to their former condition who have already been ruined, but it may save hundreds of thousands who are on the brink of ruin. Besides, it will make some atonement to the violated laws, to an outraged constitution. If there is a member of the Senate who doubts the reality of that distress which we are informed, prevades the whole country, let him mingle among the worthy citizens of this District—let him learn from that portion of them who are not fed out of the public crib; the ruin of their banks, the want of a circulating medium, the destruction of confidence, and the entire loss of business.

Mr. President, I believe I have now noticed the prominent points in the memorial I am about to present; and will not detain the Senate longer. Be assured, the representation made in it, by the eight hundred subscribers to it, is no fiction—it is real. In the month of October last they were prosperous, contented, and happy. The industrious husbandman was well rewarded for his toil. Their wheat was selling readily for one dollar and fifteen cents per bushel; their tobacco, the staple of the county, was at a high price, and improving; property of every kind was sold readily at the best prices. Now, sir, this picture is reversed. Their wheat is dull at seventy-five cents; the price for their tobacco reduced, and that nominal; property greatly fallen in value; their currency has vanished; their circulating medium has disappeared, and a universal distrust and gloom overshadow them.

The memorial was then referred.

Mr. WILKINS gave notice, that, when the Senator from Virginia, who was entitled to the floor on the special order, should have concluded his remarks, he would move for the Senate to go into the consideration of Executive business. This notice, he said, was necessary, having reference to matters connected with our foreign relations, which ought speedily to be acted on.

On motion of Mr. POINDEXTER, Ordered, that, when the Senate adjourn, it adjourn over to Monday next.

PRESIDENT'S PROTEST.

The Senate then resumed the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, being the motion not to receive the message of the President of the United States on the subject of the resolution of the Senate of the 28th ult.; when

Mr. LEIGH rose and said, that whatever surprise the paper sent hither by the President, and read yesterday, might have produced out of doors, he presumed there was no member of the Senate to whom it came unexpected. Every man here must have been aware, for some time past, of the actual commencement of hostilities by that potentate against this body, and prepared, of course, for the public declaration of war that was soon to follow. The language of this manifesto had been described, by the friends of the administration, as temperate and moderate; and it was temperate enough, in the sense in which that epithet might be applied to all denunciations of war by civilized powers, in modern times—as temperate as is compatible with the nature and purpose of such denunciations. There was nothing in the mere language of this extraordinary paper that was offensive to him—it was the act itself that roused his indignation. He felt that sentiment very strongly; never, on any occasion, more strongly; and if he were to indulge the expression of his feelings, he should not, like the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. SERRAULT,] speak more in grief than in anger, much less would his language be in unison with that cheerful mood in which the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. KING] had spoken on the subject, for he felt as if we were even now treading among the ruins of the constitution. He should, however, endeavor to suppress all emotions of passion. His purpose was to examine this act of the President, the motive that obviously dictated it, its manifest design and object, and the mischief which it but too certainly portended.

What, then, said he, is the true character of the act? It is apparent in every line of this paper, neither, in truth, is there any dispute about it; for the gentleman from Missouri, who had certainly been previously apprized of its contents, since he came prepared with extracts from the Federalist, to sustain some of the positions assumed by the President—extracts, of which, without the spirit of divination, he could not have seen the application to the purpose, unless he had a previous accurate knowledge—the gentleman from Missouri tells us that this is a solemn appeal to the American people, by the President, against the Senate; an appeal, he must allow, such as has never before been attempted or thought of. And I add, and shall prove, that this is a quarrel causelessly sought by the President with the Senate, to be submitted to the decision of the people, in which he hopes for victory, and, if he succeeds, is prepared to avail himself of all the advantages of victory to the uttermost.

The President proposes a trial of the weight of his personal popularity and of the Executive influence, against the constitutional powers and rights of the Senate, and the privilege of this branch of the legislature to exercise its own judgment concerning its own rights and duties. He undertakes to prescribe to us the limits of our legislative functions. If he fail in this trial of his strength, the only consequence will be some mortification of his pride, and a grievous disappointment of the gratification of those fierce and burning resentments which but too plainly influence all his actions. The constitution will remain unaltered and unimpaired. But if the people shall sustain him in this appeal, the constitution of the Senate will be directly attacked. He has indicated his own personal motives, and the political objects he is seeking to accomplish in respect to the Senate, in this very paper, and that in language too plain to be misunderstood by any man who will not shut his mind to every thing but plain, unequivocal avowal. He says: "If the censures of the Senate be submitted to by the President, the confidence of the people in his ability and virtue, and the character and usefulness of his administration, will soon be at an end, and the real power of the Government will fall into the hands of a body, holding their offices for long terms, not elected by the people, and not to them directly responsible. If, on the other hand, the illegal censures of the Senate should be resisted by the President, collisions and angry controversies might ensue, discreditable in their progress, and in the end compelling the people to adopt the conclusion, either that their Chief Magistrate was unworthy of their respect, or that the Senate was chargeable with calumny and injustice. Either of these results would impair public confidence in the perfection of the system, and lead to serious alterations of its frame work, or to the practical abandonment of some of its provisions." And in another part, he says: "But if the Senate have a right to interfere with the executive powers, they have also the right to make that interference effective, and if the assertion of the power implied in the resolution be silently acquiesced in, we may reasonably apprehend that it will be followed, at some future day, by an attempt at actual enforcement. The Senate may refuse, except on the condition that he will surrender his opinions to theirs, and obey their will, to perform their own constitutional functions, to pass the necessary laws, to sanction appropriations proposed by the House of Representatives, and to confirm proper nominations by the President." Who does not see, in these expressions, the manifestation of those personal motives, which have impelled the President to hostilities against the Senate? that "the confidence of the people in his ability and virtue, and the character and usefulness of his administration," is the object that constitutes the personal motive of his conduct? Who does not see that the refusal of the Senate "to sanction appropriations proposed by the House of Representatives, and to confirm proper nominations by the President," are to be regarded by him, and to be held up to the people, as "an attempt," on our part, "at actual enforcement" of our right "to interfere with the executive powers?" Who does not also see in those allusions to the constitution of this body, "holding their offices for long terms, not elected by the people, and not to them directly responsible," the corrective which the President is aiming at? No one can suppose that "the serious alterations of the frame work, or the practical abandonment of some of the provisions" of the constitution, which he expects will grow out of these collisions between the Executive and the Senate, will be of a nature to reduce the patronage, power, and influence of the former. The House of Representatives (it must in decency be presumed) will make no appropriations, which it does not think wise and just, nor the President any nominations, which he does not think proper: but the Senate, in its legislative capacity, has an express power by the constitution, to agree to the appropriations proposed by the other House, or to dissent from them, according to its judgment: and, in the exercise of its executive functions, to give or withhold its assent to the nominations of the President, according to its sense of the merits or demerits of the nominees; and yet this exercise of our undoubted powers is to be held up to the people as a manifestation of the design of the Senate to concentrate "the real power of the Government into its own hands!" The disagreement of the Senate to appropriations proposed by the other House, is a very common case; and its disapprobation of some of the nominations already made by the President, or expected from him, may very certainly be anticipated. Such proofs of our lust of domination, he has reason enough to expect, will soon be publicly exhibited to the world. And if the people shall sustain the President in this his appeal against the Senate, it requires no political sagacity to foresee, and I venture to predict, that he will then aim at absolute conquest over this devoted body; he will then insist that its share of the appointing power shall be taken away, that the senatorial term of service shall be shortened; that the Senators shall be made subject to recall during their term, and, perhaps, that the election of them shall be transferred from the State legislatures to the people; and he will exert the whole influence of his personal popularity and executive patronage, (the latter of which is vast beyond calculation, almost beyond imagination,) to accomplish these "serious alterations in the frame work" of the constitution. It is not my purpose, at present, to inquire whether such alterations would be wise or not. I only say they would amount to a revolution in the Government. The adoption of them will abolish the only check which the wisdom of our fathers found it practicable to devise, to guard against the predominance of the National features of our institutions over the Federal, and of the executive over the other departments of this Government.

President's Protest.

Sir, these designs against the Senate are only not avowed. I as confidently believe them to exist, as if they were ever so distinctly avowed. I shall never wait till politicians or generals think proper to promulgate their plans of operations. The love of contest, and the passion for conquest, have marked the conduct of General Jackson throughout his life. He has conquered every individual that stood in his way; he has conquered the bank; he is now aiming at conquest over the Senate; and if he shall achieve that, he may then turn his arms with success against the whole constitution. I do not say, because I do not suspect, that he is now looking to this ulterior conquest, but that, at present, he is aiming at conquest over the Senate; and if the people shall sustain him in this appeal against us, he will have it in his power to achieve this conquest over us, to the utmost extent of his wishes. I have not the least confidence in his moderation or clemency after victory.

An appeal of the President to the American people against the Senate, with a view to accomplish, or even to suggest a change, formal or informal, in the constitution of the latter, through the direct intervention of the people, is, in its very nature, of a revolutionary tendency. In representative republics like ours, when once the Government is established, the people always act through their agents—their constituted authorities; they never resume the original powers inherent in them, but for the purpose of altering or abolishing their ancient forms, and establishing new: and whenever one department of the Government appeals directly to the people against another, and invokes their interposition, it expects the people no longer to act through their constituted authorities, but to act against them—to supersede, to abrogate, or at least to alter them. The House of Representatives and the Senate are co-ordinate branches of the Federal legislature. The Executive is not exactly a co-ordinate department of the Government. Until the President developed the faculties of the Executive power, all men thought it inferior to the legislative—he manifestly thinks it superior; and in his hands the monarchical part of the Government (for the Executive is monarchical, though it be elective for a term of years, by which it was hoped—I now fear, vainly hoped—to obviate mischief from its power) has proved far stronger than the representatives of the people, stronger than the representatives of the States, stronger than both combined; and if success shall still attend his inordinate pretensions, he will soon lead them to absolute submission. He has proclaimed to the world, that neither "the voice of the legislature, nor the will of the people," shall induce him to change his course of measures. He has no respect for the opinion of the people, when that opinion is against him; he only appeals to the people when he wants their aid to subdue the Senate. The republic is in danger.

I have said that the President has raised this quarrel with the Senate without cause or provocation. His pretext for it is one of the resolutions of this House on the subject of the deposits, which is in these words: "Resolved, That the President of the United States, in the Executive proceedings in relation to the public revenue, has assumed upon himself authority and power not conferred by the constitution and laws, but in derogation of both." The language of the resolution was carefully selected, in order to avoid the imputation of crime: it is not affirmed that he has usurped unconstitutional and illegal power, for that phrase would have imported design and wilfulness; it is not said that he has wilfully assumed, but, only, that he has assumed, namely, taken upon himself, such power; it is not said that he has done this in violation, in defiance, or in contempt of the constitution and laws, but in derogation from them—that is, that his measures tended to impair them, or to prevent or weaken their operation. There is not a word in the res solution that implies a criminal intent, nor was it intended to impute one. But the President reads this resolution as if it charged him with having criminally usurped power, in wilful violation of the constitution and laws. Be- hold how he justifies the interpretation of it? He says, 'That the language of the resolution does not expressly allege that the assumption of power and authority which it condemns was intentional and corrupt, is no answer to the preceding view of its character and effect. The act has condemned, necessarily implies volition and design in the individual to whom it is imputed, and, being unlawful in its character, the legal conclusion is, that it was prompted by improper motives, and committed with an unlawful intent. The charge is not of a mistake in the exercise of supposed powers, but of the assumption of powers not conferred by the constitution and laws, but in derogation of both; and nothing is suggested to excuse or palliate the turpitude of the act. In the absence of any such excuse or palliation, there is only room for one inference, and that is, that the intent was unlawful and corrupt. Besides, the resolution not only contains no mitigating suggestion, but on the contrary it holds up the act complained of, as justly obnoxious to censure and reprobation, and thus as distinctly stamps it with impurity of motive, as if the strongest epithets had been used.' Now, I have always understood, and I should have supposed that the President, who has been a judge, would have known, that the allegation of a criminal intent is of the essence of every criminal accusation; and I apprehend that I never before was imagined that the omission to allege criminal intent was supplied by an omission of any circumstances of excuse or justification that might lead to acquittal. Neither is there but one supposition on which his reasoning of the President can hold good; and that is, that he is so profoundly versed in the constitution and laws, and so well known to the whole world, and especially to the Senate, to be an infallible judge of them, that it is impossible for any one to impute a departure from them by him, to mistake or error of judgment; and, therefore, the Senate must have intended to charge his aberrations to a wilful criminal design to violate the constitution and the laws, which it is his duty to observe and maintain. Surely, sir, this man is possessed with a degree of presumption that never mortal man beside was cursed withal! A presumption which, whether it proceeds from native vanity, or the favors of fortune, or the poison of flattery, must be to himself a copious source of error as well as of bitterness and of evil to his country. The Supreme Court of the United States has been often charged with giving judgments contrary to the constitution: the President himself has made such charges against that court. Congress has been, over and over again, charged with passing laws not warranted by the constitution; and the President has repeatedly alleged this against the legislature. Congress has been charged with passing, and the President with approving, unconstitutional acts; and, if I am rightly informed, the President has alleged this in respect of acts, or parts of acts, which he himself has approved. In debate here, gentlemen are daily contending that the opinions and votes of each other are contrary to the constitution. Who ever thought that such allegations implied a charge of crime—of a wilful violation of the constitution? It is only when such an allegation is brought by the Senate against the President—by this Senate against his President—that the Senate must necessarily intend to arraign him, without any impeachment from the other House, and to try and convict him without a hearing. And this is the daring violation of the constitution for which the President appeals to the American people against the Senate!

If, Mr. President, the Senate had entered into an examination of the recent measures of the Executive, and declared them faultless, or if we had held the opinion that, though those measures were illegal and unconstitutional, yet his motives were most pure and patriotic, and his proceedings judicious, politic, and necessary, and that he was entitled to the gratitude of his country and to the support of Congress; if the Senate had thus pronounced judgment of acquittal of the President, without any anticipation of an impeachment by the other House, and much more with a certainty that there was to be no impeachment, I apprehend he would then have seen, distinctly enough, that we were acting in our legislative, not in our judicial capacity. Indeed, the President intimates such an opinion in the complaint he makes that our resolution suggests nothing to excuse, palliate, or mitigate the misconduct imputed to him. But I have never heard of but one precedent for this principle and form of proceeding, and that is to be found in the example of a certain prostituted editor whom you and I wot of: all the rest of mankind have been of opinion with the Senate, that unconstitutional and illegal conduct in a Chief Magistrate, though it may not be criminal, is yet not a just subject for praise and gratitude.

The President himself holds the Senate criminal, not only on account of what it has done, but what it has not done. He not only refers to the resolution which the Senate did adopt, but to one which was proposed, but not adopted. Hear him. "Still further to exemplify this feature of the proceeding, it is important to be remarked that the resolution, as originally offered to the Senate, specified, with adequate precision, certain acts of the President, which it denounced as a violation of the constitution and laws; and that it was not until the very close of the debate, and when, perhaps, it was apprehended that a majority might not sustain the specific accusation contained in it, that the resolution was so modified as to assume its present form. A more striking illustration of the soundness and necessity of the rules which forbid vague and indefinite generalities and require a reasonable certainty in all judicial allegations, and a more glaring instance of the violation of those rules, has seldom been exhibited." Sir, I shall be understood by every man who has bestowed the least attention to the principles of our Government, when I say that the President, officially, has no right to know and take notice of any thing said or proposed in either House of Congress—of any thing but their acts. And if he were a reasonable man, much more, if he be a Christian, (as he professes to be, and I shall not question that he is,) reason and religion should have taught him so much charity as to hold us only accountable for what we have done, and to forgive us for that which we have avoided to do.

There is no end of the enormous pretensions which the President sets up for the executive power, in the wonderful paper under consideration. While he denies the right of the Senate, in its legislative capacity, to express any opinion (except a favorable one) concerning the legality and constitutionality of the acts of the Executive, or to exercise its own judgment as to the extent of its legislative powers and the nature of its own acts, he claims and exercises the right to judge of the constitutionality of our acts, to determine the character of them, to ascertain when we are acting in our judicial and when in our legislative capacity, and to prescribe to us the prison-bounds within which it is allowed us to move, but from which we must not depart. Such is the freedom of deliberation and action which it seems good to his wisdom to concede to us. He speaks to us in the imperial style of the Cæsars to the degraded Senate of Rome, while yet the ancient forms of the republic were decently preserved; and, in the tone of papal infallibility, calls on all faithful subjects, and all true catholics, to respect, support, obey, and conform with his decisions.

The President insists that the offensive resolution of the Senate was not intended as a ground of any legislative action; that the Senate has no right, in its legislative capacity, to pass any resolution which is not intended to be the ground of legislation; and, in effect, that every resolution which does not plainly indicate on its face that it is so intended, is obnoxious to censure, as being without the pale of our legislative authority. In what code of parliamentary law he found this doctrine, it were vain to inquire: regarding it as a rule which he purposes to ordain, I understand him perfectly. How could he know, how could he undertake to affirm, that this resolution was not intended as the foundation of any legislative proceeding? If he learned it from the objections taken to the resolution by the opponents of it, in debate on this floor, the House certainly never gave him, or confirmed, any such information. The resolution may yet be the ground of legislative action; and if I shall see hereafter any reason to hope for the concurrence of the other House, I for one shall soon propose legislation on the principle asserted in the resolution—legislation to preserve the public treasure for public use. But where did he learn that neither House of Congress can pass any resolution touching the proceedings of the Executive, unless such resolution be designed as the ground of legislation? I am not very familiar with the rules of parliamentary order in the Federal legislature, but I understand those which prevail in my own State pretty well, and those which prevail in the two Houses of the British Parliament. I take them to be all substantially the same. The President, in this protest, makes reference to the institutions of Great Britain, and draws from that source arguments for his purpose. I shall be greatly surprised if he or any body else can find rule or precedent in Great Britain, in any of the State legislatures, or in either House of Congress, for this novel proposition, that every resolution not intended to be the ground of legislative action, is without the pale of legislative authority. About the close of the war of the American revolution, Mr. Dunning moved a series of resolutions, the purport of one of which was, that the influence of the Crown had increased, was increasing, and ought to be diminished; and it was carried against the tory ministry. No immediate legislation was proposed; none, in fact, ensued, or was attempted. Did George III send a message to the House of Commons, to instruct them that this resolution exceeded their legislative power, or make any appeal to the British nation against this abuse of legislative power by the Commons? During the second administration of the elder William Pitt, in order to avoid the apprehended danger of scarcity, a royal proclamation was issued, forbidding the exportation of corn, and thereby suspending a law of the land. The ministry were responsible for the act. In the subsequent session of Parliament, the subject came under the consideration of the House of Lords—the expediency of the measure was universally admitted—Lord Camden insisted that it was lawful, founding his argument on the plea of an over-ruling necessity; but Lord Mansfield maintained that a royal proclamation, suspending a law of the land, was, under any conceivable state of circumstances, unlawful and unconstitutional; and of this opinion was the House of Lords. But, if I rightly remember, no legislation ensued, or was proposed. Did Lord Chatham, the proudest of mankind, (I do not speak of him with irreverence, for his was the pride of conscious and transcendent virtue and ability,) complain that the House of Lords, the high court of impeachment, had prejudged his case, arraigned him without any impeachment from the Commons, tried and convicted him of a violation of the laws, of a usurpation of power? Did it enter into any man's head that the House of Lords was acting in a judicial and not in its legislative capacity?

Sir, the Senate was under a necessity, in its legislative character, of considering the subject of the resolution which has given the President so much offence. Mr. Secretary Taney, in a report to Congress, at the commencement of the session, had given us his reasons for the removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States; omitting, however, to state the main, if not the only reason, on which his order for the removal of the deposits was founded, namely, the positive order of the President to that effect. I say this was the main, if not the only reason on which the Secretary's order was in truth founded; for the President had told the matter, in the most explicit terms, that the measure was his own, that he took it upon his sole responsibility; and if Mr. Taney had, unsustained by the authority of the President, taken such a step, he could not have withstood, for a moment, the torrent of public indignation. The Senate called for the paper which the President had published to the world; it was not given to us; but the authenticity of the publication, and the history of the transaction contained, were admitted. The Senate having, by one resolution, declared the reasons for the measure stated in the Secretary's report, unsatisfactory and insufficient, it became absolutely necessary to consider whether the other and the real reason of the measure, namely, the order of the President, was a justification of the Secretary's conduct. The Senate was obliged to consider the question whether the President had any constitutional or legal power to give any such order. If the resolution which disapproved the reasons alleged in the Secretary's report, was (as no man has ever doubted it was) within the legislative competency of the Senate, so was the other resolution, which affirmed that the President's orders were, of themselves, not warranted by the constitution and laws, and therefore afforded no good reason, no justification, no excuse, for the Secretary's removal of the deposits.

But, sir, let us see what is the principle of these executive proceedings which our resolution disapproves—derogatory from the constitution and the laws. We have been disputing what the principle in truth was; the President has now avowed it; and, in doing so, has distinctly admitted that the opposition understood it correctly, and that the friends of the administration had no adequate conception of its extent. He says:

"The custody of the public property, under such regulations as may be prescribed by legislative authority, has always been considered an appropriate function of the executive department in this and all other Governments. In accordance with this principle, every species of property belonging to the United States (excepting that which is in the use of the several co-ordinate departments of the Government, as means to aid them in performing their appropriate functions) is in charge of officers appointed by the President, whether it be lands, or buildings, or merchandise, or provisions, or clothing, or arms and munitions of war. The superintendents and keepers of the whole are appointed by the President, and responsible to him, and removable at his will.

"Public money is but a species of public property. It cannot be raised by taxation or customs, nor brought into the Treasury in any other way, except by law; but wherever or howsoever obtained, its custody always has been, and always must be, unless the constitution be changed, intrusted to the executive department. No officer can be created by Congress for the purpose of taking charge of it, whose appointment would not, by the constitution, at once devolve on the President, and who would not be responsible to him for the faithful performance of his duties. The legislative power may undoubtedly bind him and the President, by any laws they may think proper to enact; they may prescribe in what place particular portions of the public money shall be kept, and for what reason it shall be removed, as they may direct that supplies for the army or navy shall be kept in particular stores; and it will be the duty of the President to see that the law is faithfully executed; yet will the custody remain in the executive department of the Government. Were the Congress to assume, with or without a legislative act, the power of appointing officers independently of the President, to take the charge and custody of the public property contained in the military and naval arsenals, magazines, and storehouses, it is believed that such an act would be regarded by all as a palpable usurpation of executive power, subversive of the form as well as the fundamental principles of our Government. But where is the difference in principle, whether the public property be in the form of arms, munitions of war and supplies, or in gold and silver or bank notes? None can be perceived; none is believed to exist. Congress cannot, therefore, take out of the hands of the executive department the custody of the public property or money, without an assumption of executive power, and a subversion of the first principles of the constitution."

"Whosoever, or however obtained, the custody" of public money "always has been, and always must be, unless the constitution be changed, intrusted to the executive department." "Congress cannot take out of the hands of the executive department the custody of the public property or money, without an assumption of executive power, and a subversion of the first principles of the constitution." Such are the President's opinions as to the extent of his executive prerogatives; and such the prerogatives he must challenge for himself, in order to justify, or even to excuse the proceedings which the resolution of the Senate declares to be derogatory from the constitution and the laws. Will the eyes of his partisans, hitherto blinded by their confidence in the innocence of his intentions, and the harmlessness of his designs, be at length opened! or will they be willing, in deference to his judgment, to establish the dangerous doctrines into which those errors have betrayed him as the practical constitution of their country?

If the opinion of the President as to the extent of his power over the public treasure, now at last distinctly and most deliberately avowed to the nation, shall indeed receive the approbation of the people, which he so confidently expects, he need never ask any further concession of power. According to the principle he asserts, if the sixteenth section of the charter of the bank had peremptorily directed that the public moneys should be deposited in the bank, in the interval between the collection and the disbursement, without giving any discretion to the Secretary of the Treasury to remove them, the President would still have had a power to take them away, at his discretion or at his pleasure. The provision that the Secretary, in case he should direct them to be removed, should report his reasons to Congress, was nugatory and idle; the reasons which the Secretary did report, were altogether impertinent; and every proposition of law maintained by him, in his report, as to the nature of his power over the subject, stands contradicted and condemned. For it is most obvious, that if the President's claim of power be just, his Secretary ought to have assigned no other reason for the measure, than that the President ordered it. I knew all along that it was his main if not his only reason; and the President himself has now, in effect, acknowledged that it was the only substantial reason of his Secretary's conduct, and maintains that it was all-sufficient. And yet he protests against the right of the Senate, in its legislative capacity, to examine and resolve the question, whether this reason be well founded in the constitution and the laws! Again, if two-thirds of both Houses of Congress, nay, if both Houses by unanimous vote, were to resolve that the deposits were improperly removed, and ought, in justice and policy, to be restored, or if they should unanimously resolve that the public moneys hereafter collected should be deposited in the bank until the expiration of its charter, which, I believe, is the only restoration of the deposits that it would be now practicable to accomplish, the President would still be entitled to the custody of the money, by virtue of his new-found executive prerogatives, and might refuse to restore the deposits, or restoring them, might take them away again the next day. And from his right to the custody of the public treasure, I suppose, he derives, by implication, the right he has exercised, to dispose of it also; for I repeat what I have had occasion to explain before, that he has, in fact, lent the public money to favored State banks, avowedly to enable them to pay their debts to the Bank of the United States, and to trade on the surplus for their own profit. What becomes of the Treasurer's obligation to take care of the money? Of what effect is the official bond with surety, which the law requires of him, for the faithful discharge of his duty? If the President is entitled to the custody of the public treasure, and takes it out of the Treasurer's hands, and this officer is bound to surrender it at his bidding, his official bond, of course, is saved. That piece of parchment had as well be committed to the flames.

It is impossible to find in the constitution any plausible ground, upon which this sweeping claim of the President to the custody of all public moneys, without the assent and in defiance of the legislature, can be supported. The constitution contains a specific enumeration of the powers and duties of the Executive. It gives the President the command of the land and naval forces: and, if the custody of the public treasure, which is equally important, had been intended to be confided to him, it is wholly unaccountable that no mention of it should be found in the enumeration of the powers and duties of the Executive. There is none. This claim is the boldest implication of power that has yet been attempted. The legislature having the power to lay and collect taxes, to pay the public debts, and provide for the common defence, and the power also to borrow money, the only reasonable implication is, that the custody and the disposition of money, raised in any way, belong to the legislature. Is the custody of the public money in its nature so essentially an executive function, that it cannot possibly be vested in any other functionary but the President? This was never before pretended; and, certainly, in most of the State Governments, (I speak positively as to that of Virginia,) so far from the custody of their treasure being considered as appertaining of necessity to the Executive, that department has never had any thing to do with it. Does the President claim this important prerogative from his power to remove the Secretary of the Treasury and the Treasurer at pleasure? He has the power also to remove the marshals of the courts of justice. Is he, therefore, high sheriff of the whole nation? Is he responsible for the conduct of these his deputies? May he direct and control them in the execution of all their duties? May he direct the marshal to proceed to execution of judgment of death pronounced by a circuit court, pending a writ of error in the Supreme Court, because he is of opinion that the appellate tribunal has no jurisdiction of the cause by the constitution or the laws? Or, may he forbid him to execute a final judgment of the Supreme Court, which he thinks contrary to the constitution? Questions of this kind might be multiplied without limit. I defy the ingenuity of man to invent an argument that will bear examination, for this implied right to the custody of the public treasure, which the President now boldly claims as one of the inherent and indestructible prerogatives of the Executive.

Without further discussion of this topic, I beg leave to state, briefly, my general idea of the extent of the executive powers of the Government. The President has all the powers enumerated in the second article of the constitution, and these, certainly, Congress can nowise take from him: and, moreover, he has all such executive powers as Congress, in the exercise of the legislative powers delegated to it, has created and vested in him by law; but wherever the legislature has authority to create powers of any kind by law, it may provide by law the officer who is to execute them, and regulate the office. There may be exceptions to this principle; such, for example, as grow out of the President's constitutional power as commander-in-chief of the land and naval forces which the legislature may raise: but this is the general principle, applicable particularly to the administration of civil affairs.

[SENATE.]

President's Protest.

The grounds on which the President has thought proper to make this appeal to the American people against the Senate; the motive and the design with which it is made; the reasonableness of his expectations that the people will sustain him in it; and the probable consequences, if they sustain him; are considerations that address themselves to every man in the community, as much as the members of the Senate. But it behooves us, especially, as members of this body, to inquire by what right the President has sent this protest to the Senate, and with what color of reason he asks us to register it in our Journal. His purpose is an appeal to the people, and an appeal to their posterity; and, I presume, he wishes the Senate to join in both appeals. As an appeal to posterity, the protest, whether entered on our Journal or not, will probably never be heard of, unless the people, presently existing, shall sustain the President in his pretensions: then, indeed, it will be recorded by history as another instance of successful audacity in achieving unlimited power, and of the blind fatuity with which men, to accomplish party purposes, voluntarily renounce their liberty, and forfeit the richest blessings of Providence, of which there are already so many examples in the annals of mankind. As an appeal to the people, which they are presently to decide, the publication of this protest against the proceedings of the Senate, would be as effectual a means of submitting the appeal to the people, as the registration of it on the Journal of this House; indeed, the registration of it on our Journal would be altogether inefficient for that purpose, if it were not promulgated through the public press. Why then was this protest sent to us? I can conceive no other purpose than that of denouncing our proceedings to ourselves; of raising a quarrel with us, or of putting us to shame by the exposure of our folly, or of alarming our fears, and inducing us to retrace our steps. And by what right does the President send such a paper to us, and ask us to register it? The third section of the second article of the constitution is the only provision that regulates the communications of the President to the two Houses of Congress, (I am not speaking of his communications to the Senate, on what is called executive business,) and this section only provides that the President "shall, from time to time, give to the Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient." Now, surely, no one can think that this provision authorizes the President to communicate to us such a paper as this protest. Sir, as this communication is without precedent, so it is without color or pretence of constitutional authority; a protest addressed to the Senate, against its own proceedings, containing an appeal to the people, to be submitted to and determined by the people.

The President refers, in this paper, to the principles and usages of the British Government. I wish he would be content with only such powers as are conceded to the King of Great Britain; for, though I should never consent to allow any such to him, it would, on his part, be a return towards moderation. If the President considers the resolution of the Senate as an act done, gone by, irrevocable, and on which there is to be no further action in the Senate, I do not see why he may not as well take up the Journal of the Senate from the beginning, call out all its errors and all its faults, (of which, without doubt, he might find many,) expose them to the people, denounce the vices inherent in the constitution of this body, appeal to its conduct as evidence of those vices, and suggest the corrective that ought to be applied. If, on the other hand, the President regards this offensive resolution as yet revocable, as in truth it is; if he supposes it may be the ground of legislative action, as certainly it may be; if he anticipates the proposition suggested by the gentleman from Missouri, to be repeated session after session, till it shall prevail, to expunge the resolution from the Journal; then is this protest a palpable and direct breach of the rights and privileges of the Senate. The parliamentary law on this subject is stated with clearness and precision in Jefferson's Manual, page 116. "It is highly expedient," says Hatsell, "for the due preservation of the privileges of the separate branches of the legislature, that neither should encroach on the other, or interfere in any matter depending before them, so as to preclude or even influence that freedom of debate which is essential to a free council. They are, therefore, not to take notice of any bills or other matters depending, or of votes that have been given, or of speeches that have been held, by the members of either of the other branches of the legislature, till the same have been communicated to them in the usual parliamentary manner. (2 Hats. 253, 4 Inst. 15, Sed. Jud. 53.) Thus, the King's taking notice of a bill for suppressing soldiers, depending before the House; his proposing a provisional clause for a bill before it was presented to him by the two Houses; his expressing displeasure against some persons for matters moved in Parliament during the debate and preparation of a bill; were breaches of privileges. (2 Nelson, 743.) And in 1783, December 17, it was declared a breach of fundamental privileges, &c., to report any opinion or pretended opinion of the King, on any bill or proceeding depending in either House of Parliament, with a view to influence the vote of the members. (2 Hats. 251, 6.) In the British Parliament, any member of the House of Lords has a constitutional right to enter his protest on the Journals against the proceedings of the House; there is no such right of protest known to the constitution of the House of Commons, and no such right of protest has ever been imagined to exist for individual members of either House of our legislature. No right has ever been acknowledged in a King of Great Britain to send to either House of his Parliament a protest against any of its proceedings, past or pending—I mean since the revolution of 1688—I will not look back to the history of the Stuarts, the Tudors, and the Plantagenets. Gen. Jackson may, very probably, find precedents for his conduct in the reign of Henry VIII.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. KING] thinks he has found a precedent for this protest against our proceedings, sent to us to be registered on our Journal, in a message of Washington to the Senate, found in the 1st volume of the Executive Journal, p. 14. To every precedent of Washington's administration, touching the exercise of executive power, I am disposed to pay the utmost respect; with this qualification, however, that due allowances should be made for errors and irregularities incident to the first operations of a new system, which no human wisdom could have entirely avoided. There never was there never will be, another man so fit as Washington for the office of President of the United States. There never was, there never will be, another man of equal wisdom and virtue, and especially of the virtue of moderation, who at the same time has been, or will be placed, by the circumstances of his previous life and services, in a situation above the necessity of using, much more of abusing, his patronage, and above the influence of party spirit, which might make him the President of a party, and not of the whole nation—in a position that gave him a commanding influence, sufficient to enable him to administer the Government by the force of wisdom and virtue alone. religiously believe that he was the best, the wisest, and the greatest man the world ever saw: his virtues alone constituted the highest wisdom; he had talents suited to every station he ever filled; his moral qualities were all great talents. But what is the precedent which the gentleman from Alabama quotes? Washington nominated a person as an officer of the revenue, and the Senate refused to concur in the nomination: he did not re-nominate the same person for the office, like another President—but, perhaps, it is not proper that I should pursue the contrast in this particular. Washington nominated another person for the office; and, in the same message that contained the new nomination, stated the information he had received as to the character of the first nominee, as his apology for nominating a man for office whom the Senate had deemed unworthy. I pray gentlemen, in the first place to consider, that the President, in that instance, was communicating with the Senate, on the subject of an appointment which appertained to the Senate and the President jointly, and upon which the Senate might, if it saw good cause, reconsider its former vote: the message was strictly regular. And, in the next place, let any man contrast the modest language of that message, with the haughty, imperious tone of this protest, and find, if he can, any justification or apology in the example of Washington for the conduct of Jackson.

But President Jackson has discovered a new source of executive prerogative in his oath of office. Never had I imagined it possible that any man could seriously look to the President's official oath as a substantive grant of executive powers. But, considered in the point of view in which the President in this protest regards it, it is a most copious source of power, and (which is worse) of vague, undefined, illimitable power. He sends us this protest, and deems it his right and his duty to do so, and our duty to register it in our Journal, because he is bound by his oath of office, "to the best of his ability, to preserve, protect, and defend the constitution of the United States." Supposing this a justification of this protest against the proceedings of the Senate, this appeal by the President to the American people against this branch of the legislature, let us consider, for a moment, the extent to which the President may, and, if he is consistent, must carry the principle. If the Supreme Court of the United States shall entertain a jurisdiction which, in his opinion, the constitution has not conferred on the Federal judiciary; or, if it shall decide a cause involving a constitutional question contrary to his ideas of the true construction of the constitution; and, especially, if it shall decide a cause involving a question as to the extent of the executive powers under the constitution and laws—in any of these cases, it will be the right and duty of the President to send his protest to the court, ask the judges to register it in their order-book, lay an appeal from their judgment to the American people, and, referring to the exemption of the judges from responsibility by reason of their tenure of office during good behaviour, suggest a corrective of the evil. If any of the State legislatures pass an act which the President thinks contrary to the constitution of the United States, or adopt a resolution disapproving the conduct of the Federal Executive, as illegal and unconstitutional, he has the right, and is in duty bound, to send his protest to the offending body, require it to enter it on its own Journal, appeal to the whole American people against the single State, and suggest the propriety and necessity of curbing the free action and the free expression of opinion on such subjects by any and all of the State legislatures. Sir, the case has actually occurred—the legislature of Virginia has disapproved the President's recent measures, in terms quite as strong as those of our resolutions, and has laid its resolutions on the subject before both Houses of the Federal legislature; and the General Assembly may expect, at its next session, one of these protests from the President against its proceedings at the last session. One would be curious to see how the Jackson State-rights party in that body would treat such a protest. I hardly think they would be willing to receive and register it in their Journals in deference to the President's sense of the religious obligation of his oath. The State legislatures of New Jersey and Ohio, which have approved the measures of the Executive, need not fear any such protest, any rebuke, any exertion of the vast influence of the Federal Executive, to discredit them with their own constituents, and with the American people at large: his oath of office will nowise oblige him to suppress the sentiments of those who join in hosannas to the praise and glory of General Jackson's name. Indeed, I do not see how the duty imposed, and the power conferred on him, by his oath of office, can be restrained to the suppression of the sentiments of either branch of the Federal legislature, or of the State legislatures, or of the courts of justice, State or Federal, or confined to the method of protest only. I do not see why he is not just as much bound and empowered to suppress all assemblages of the people, held to remonstrate against his official acts, as unconstitutional and unlawful; and why, in order to protect and defend the constitution of the United States, by maintaining his own executive powers unimpaired, he may not put down the House of Representatives as well as the Senate, turn any of the State legislatures out of doors, pull any of the judges from the judgment seat, and quell any seditious assemblage of the people, by the strong arm of power. It is unnecessary to pursue the argument further. This resort to his official oath as a measure of duty and grant of power, is a claim to power, illimitable, uncontrollable, monstrous. I can only impute it to that intoxication of mind which the possession of power is so apt to produce, and to that lust for more and more power, which has but too often, in the history of nations, rendered the favorites of the people their bane and scourge.

The gentleman from Alabama intimates the opinion that the whole and sole object of the opposition to the measures of this administration is to pull down the party now in power, and elevate other men to their places. I will not make the obvious retort, that it would be just as fair to impute to the friends of the administration, that it is their sole object to keep power in the hands which now hold it. But I shall (as I can sincerely) say, before God and my country, that to whomsoever the remark may be applicable, it is not justly applicable to me. I wish with all my heart that the President would change his course of measures, and enable me, as an honest man and faithful public servant, to give him my support; neither have I any feeling, motive, or object, that would induce me to withhold or stint it. The President concludes his protest with a eulogium on himself, and the gentleman from Alabama, with less offence to modesty certainly, though not with more justice, concluded his remarks yesterday, with a eulogium on the President, and an earnest demand of our gratitude for his services since he has filled his present exalted station. He tells us that we are indebted to the President for demolishing that temple of corruption and sin, the Bank of the United States: be it so: we should have been more indebted to him, if, in his attacks upon the bank, he had not laid his reckless hands on the pillars of the constitution, and shaken them to their foundations. Then, the gentleman insists that we are indebted to the President for putting an end to the system of internal improvement; a debt, which, if it were due, only a portion of the people, excluding many of the President's warmest friends, would acknowledge as an obligation; but how has he put a stop to the system of internal improvements, by money appropriated from the Federal Treasury? Simply, by the invention of that notable distinction between works of a local and works of a national character, whereby he has incalculably increased the patronage and power of the Executive, and in the practical application of which, there has been during his administration, more money appropriated to works of internal improvement, and a vast deal more, than ever was appropriated to similar objects, in the same space of time, during any former administration. The gentleman from Alabama, and I, and those who think with us on this subject, owe him no debt of gratitude on this account. We are indebted to General Jackson too, in the opinion of the gentleman, for the relaxation of the system of protecting duties. Indeed! Indebted to General Jackson, who voted for the tariff of 1824! who never has said one word or done one single act to bring about any relaxation of that system! Let any man point, if he can, to any evidence of a serious hearty effort of General Jackson, by word or deed, to relax this system; let any man show me how, when, or where, he has done more than to recommend a "judicious tariff," and explain to me the meaning of that vague generality. Sir, I cannot but remember, that during the anxious winter of 1832-'3, when South Carolina, under a deep sense of injustice and oppression, (whether well or ill founded, it is immaterial now to inquire,) was exerting her utmost efforts (no matter now, whether wisely or not) to bring about a relaxation of the system—when all men were trembling under the apprehension of civil war—trembling from the conviction, that if such a contest should arise, let it terminate how it might, it would put our present institutions in jeopardy, and end either in consolidation or disunion—for I am persuaded, that the first drop of blood which shall be shed in civil strife between the Federal Government and any State, will flow from an immedicable wound that none may hope ever to see healed—I cannot but remember, that the President, though wielding such a vast power and influence, never contributed the least aid to bring about the compromise that saved us from the evils which all men, I believe, and I certainly, so much dreaded. The men are not present, to whom we are chiefly indebted for that compromise; and I am glad they are absent, since it enables me to speak of their conduct as I feel, without restraint from a sense of delicacy—I raise my humble voice in gratitude for that service to Henry Clay of the Senate, and Robert P. Letcher of the House of Representatives.

[Here there was some applause in the galleries, which was followed by a good deal of disorder and confusion, which lasted some time.]

The VICE PRESIDENT suspended the discussion, and ordered the galleries to be cleared.

While the Sergeant-at-Arms was in the act of clearing the galleries, the noises in them were repeated.

Mr. BENTON then moved that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to take into custody those persons who disturbed the Senate.

Mr. MOORE expressed a doubt as to the propriety of the motion; it being utterly impracticable. The gallery was clearing as rapidly as possible, and he was not disposed to vote for the motion.

Mr. BENTON called for the yeas and nays on the motion; and they were ordered.

Mr. CLAYTON said, that he regretted that the motion had been made, but since it had, he should vote against it. The motion was placed, by the gentleman from Missouri, on the ground of an intended contempt of the Senate. Now he did not regard this act as intending to insult the Senate. It was an indiscreet expression of the public opinion; but he could not consent that, for this indiscretion, the Senate should array itself against the galleries and the people.

Mr. BENTON replied, that the terms in which he expressed his motion were so distinct, as not to be misunderstood. He would not be misunderstood. He did not move to take into custody those who, in an ungoverned moment, applauded the sentiments uttered by the Senator from Virginia, but those who, long after that gentleman had taken his seat, continued to outrage and insult the Senate.

Mr. BELL moved that the Senate now adjourn; but the CHAIR pronounced the motion out of order, pending the other question.

A motion was then made to lay the motion on the table; but the CHAIR pronounced the motion out of order.

While the order of the CHAIR was in the progress of execution—

Mr. CALHOUN suggested that there was one objection to the motion; and that was, the impossibility of executing the order which had been given. It was not possible for the Sergeant-at-Arms to execute any such order.

Mr. POINDEXTER said, that, if the honorable Senator would name the person who had committed the offense, he would have no objection to vote for a warrant to arrest such individual. But any such order to be now issued, would be a general warrant of arrest, and, as such, would be an unconstitutional act. It was necessary to designate the offender, and the crime he had committed, before a warrant could be issued. Here, therefore, was a motion to issue a general warrant, and, under that warrant, the whole city might be brought here; every individual who had been present in the gallery during the day might be arrested, for the purpose of discovering who among them had been guilty of the contempt. If the gentleman desired that any particular individual should be arrested, let him name the person, and then (Mr. P.) would be ready to vote for the arrest.

Mr. EWING said he entertained no doubt that the Senate had the power to arrest any individual, or any number of individuals, for an actual interruption of its proceedings, whilst they remained in the chamber. But he did not believe the Senate possessed the power to send a warrant beyond its walls, and no man could be brought before them without a warrant. He had witnessed the interruption, and regretted it much, and thought that some motion ought to be made to prevent it, or to punish the individuals. It could not, however, be done without the suspension of the other order. The galleries had now been cleared, except of the privileged individuals; and, therefore, they could not act further in the matter. In order to take an individual into custody, he must be designated and served with a warrant containing his name. It would not do to give a warrant to an officer and let him take an individual into custody. A general warrant could not be issued in any free country. It would be useless to proceed further in this discussion, for it was now out of the power of the Senate to designate any individual, and, therefore, he should vote against the motion of the honorable member from Missouri.

The galleries having been cleared, the CHAIR said he had decided the motion to lay the motion to take certain persons into custody on the table, to be out of order, because the order to clear the galleries was then in execution. The galleries having been cleared, the motion to lay on the table was now in order.

Mr. BIBB said he had great aversion to any noise being permitted to be made in the galleries, although he regretted the order that had been given to clear them, because there were many individuals, no doubt, present, who were strangers here, and of course totally unacquainted with the rules of the Senate. The motion which was now called to record his vote, was a general arrest of all persons in the gallery. He disclaimed any such power, and never would record his vote in favor of its exercise. From time immemorial, ever since there was a spirit of liberty in England, the public voice and public indignation, and the best whig blood in the country, were raised in opposition to general warrants. Our constitution contained an amendment carrying out the same principles. He cared not how technically lawyers might apply it in courts of justice, he went for the spirit of the rule; and if it be fit to be applied in a court of justice, it was equally fit to be applied by both Houses of Congress.

Mr. B. said a few words more, indistinctly heard, of his readiness to support any proper measure to prevent interruption to the proceedings of the Senate. The Senate had power enough to protect its own deliberations, and he would not aid in carrying this power into excess. Therefore he should vote against the motion.

Mr. BENTON asked what was the motion before the Senate.

The CHAIR replied that the motion pending was that made by the Senator from Missouri himself, to take persons into custody who had offended against the rules of the Senate.

Mr. BENTON said, the persons were all gone, and, therefore, the motion could now have no effect. The motion he made was to arrest those who where then present, and were then insulting and outraging the Senate. He made no motion for a general arrest, and no person should be permitted to charge him with having done so, without being contradicted in such terms as admitted of no equivocation. He made the motion in reference to those who were then outraging and insulting the Senate, whom he heard over his head. He asked if the business of the Senate was not interrupted? He asked if it was possible for business to proceed while the tumult was going on; and if hisses as well as applauses were not heard? Those who were permitted to applaud in a legislative body would find the same right to censure; and he asked if this was not a commencement of such scenes as were exhibited by the fish-women of Paris in the French legislature, when the members were threatened with bludgeons? He did not know whether the applauses or the hisses were loud-est, but both were equally censurable.

He did not, he repeated, move to take into custody those who applauded the gentleman from Virginia, but those who insulted the Senate and interrupted its proceedings long after he had sat down; those who were hissing, those who were applauding, and those who were trampling over his head at the time. The Sergeant-at-Arms could have designated the individuals—his eye would have been sufficient—and taken them into custody while committing the offence. He hoped those who heard him, and those who were taking notes, would not represent him as making a motion for a general order of arrest. Mr. B. then withdrew his motion, because, he said, the people were all gone.

[Mr. LEIGH then resumed and concluded his remarks. He added but little more to what is given above; and of what he did say, no accurate notes were preserved.]

Mr. EWING then obtained the floor, but, forbearing to proceed with the discussion at so late an hour, yielded the floor for the present, and

Mr. WILKINS moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Executive business.

Mr. CLAYTON said, that he could not assent to this motion. The President has menaced the very constitutional existence of the Senate. He says that, whether its censures are submitted to or resisted by him, in either event the consequences resulting from its conduct must "lead to serious alterations of the frame-work of the constitution." And he gives utterance to this sentiment in the same sentence in which he speaks of the Senate as a "body holding their offices for long terms, not elected by the people;" while in the communication from which this menace is extracted, the object of it is exposed, by the insinuation that the Senate may, in future, refuse to sanction the appropriation of public money as he desires, or to confirm his nominations. This threat, accompanied by an appeal to the people, while his executive nomination of a host of office-holders is before us, demands of us, in my judgment, the exercise of whatever of energy and firmness of character we possess, to vindicate and maintain the honor, dignity, and character of the American Senate, and of the States it represents. I propose, sir, that we pass no bill, nor confirm any important and disputed nomination, until we have decided the question before us; after which, unawed by power, and unraffled by passion, let us proceed, without the slightest regard to the President's threats, insults, or denunciations, to do our duty precisely as if he had not violated his. Let us then—but not till then—forget that this electioneering document ever had an existence, and proceed to reject all his nominations which ought to be rejected, as well as to confirm all that ought to be confirmed; in short, to do all that ought to be done, without the slightest regard to any stratagem he may resort to, for the purpose of seducing or frightening us from our duty.

Sir, the true view of this subject will not escape the American people. They will see at once that the President has been guilty of a palpable violation of the fundamental privileges of their public servants in this hall. The third section of the second article of the constitution, regulating the official intercourse of the President with the Senate, gives him power to send messages to the Senate: 1st, containing information of the state of the Union; and, 2dly, recommending some measures for their consideration and adoption. It has not been pretended that this message purports to give information of the state of the Union, or that it recommends any measure whatever for the Senate to adopt. On the contrary, it expressly purports to be a mere "protest" against a measure already considered and adopted. It denounces the conduct of the Senate, as unjustifiable and unconstitutional, in agreeing to the resolution which denied his unlimited authority over the purse as well as the sword of the nation; it debates his claim of royal prerogative, and re-affirms all his pretensions to unlimited power; it professes "promptly to expose the wrongs the Senate has done him;" and for this purpose, and under this pretence, demands a place on our records. It recommends no legislation, proposes nothing, not even the repeal of the obnoxious resolution; and is intended as a popular harangue, to be used by his partisans in the coming elections. He might as well ask us to insert any other matter on our Journals, which is daily published by his Government press, for the same purposes.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. LEIGH] has shown, by referring to Mr. Jefferson's Manual, that, independently of the grant of power to the President in the constitution, to send us messages touching the state of the Union, and to recommend certain measures for the action of Congress, the law of Parliament gives him no right to take notice of any matter depending, or of votes that have been given, or of speeches which have been held, by the members of either of the branches of the legislature, until the same have been communicated to him in the usual parliamentary manner. The resolution which is the subject of the President's message, was never communicated to him. It was a mere test of the opinions of the Senate, preparatory to its own future legislative action, and, as such, was not even communicated to the other House. Our duty, on this occasion, is illustrated by the precedent referred to by Mr. Jefferson, and so much approved by him that he has preserved it and made it a part of his Manual. "Thus," says he, "the King's taking notice of the bill for suppressing soldiers, depending before the House; his proposing a provisional clause for a bill, before it was presented to him by the two Houses; his expressing displeasure against some persons for matters moved in Parliament during the debate and preparation of a bill; were breaches of privilege: and, in 1783, it was declared a breach of fundamental privileges to report any opinion, or pretended opinion of the King, on any bill or proceeding depending in either House of Parliament, with a view to influence the votes of the members." The leading precedent among those referred to by Mr. Jefferson, to sustain his opinion, is one to which I now invite the particular attention of the Senate. I refer to Clarendon's report of it, because the advocates of the royal prerogative, or of executive power, in any age, will most readily respect his authority.

In the year 1641, at the first dawn of civil liberty in that country from which we have drawn our principal institutions, a dispute arose between the Commons of England and the King, pending the bill for the suppression of the rebellion in Ireland, in which the Commons denied the King's prerogative in any case but that of invasion from a foreign power, to press the freeborn subject. Remark, sir, that the dispute between the King and the House of Commons was, at that day, as this between the President and Senate is, a question of executive power and prerogative. We deny the President's right to the purse, while we admit his right to the sword. They denied the King's right to unlimited power over the liberty of the freeborn subject, when called upon by his prince to wield the sword. The House of Lords took part in the dispute with the King, as our House of Representatives, though undoubtedly swayed by the beat of motives, now take part with the President. The Commons of 1641 (the Whigs of the day) resisted the royal prerogative, in defiance of both King and Lords. Thereupon, the King went to the House of Commons and expressed his princely zeal for the relief of Ireland, in terms as honeyed as our President has employed to express his regard for the people in this message; and, (says Clarendon,) "taking notice of the bill for pressing, depending with the Lords, as the Commons had passed it, and the dispute raised concerning that ancient and undoubted prerogative, to avoid further debate, the King offered that the bill should pass with a salvo jure both for the King and people," (the meaning of which was, that neither the claim of the Commons nor that of the King should be considered thereafter settled by the precedent,) even as our President now asks to put his protest on the Journal, "to the end that the resolution of the Senate may not hereafter be drawn into precedent with the authority of silent acquiescence on the part of the executive department."

You observe, sir, that no official communication, on the subject before the Commons of England, had been made by order of that House, to the King. His majesty sent his protest, salvo jure, to that House, as our President has sent his protest to this Senate, without any previous official information of the proceedings regarding the executive power and prerogative. The important difference between the two cases lies here: that, in the case of the King, notice was taken of the bill pending, before it was presented to him for his approbation or dislike, in due course of Parliament. In the case of the President, while notice was taken of a resolution before it was presented to him in due course of Congress, and which was never intended (as he well knew) to be, nor could be, presented to him for his approbation or dislike, notice was also taken of the debates on the resolution, and of all the amendments moved to it, and the President's displeasure was also distinctly and strongly expressed against at least four of the Senators who voted for it—I mean, sir, the Senators from New Jersey, Maine, and Ohio.

Now, let us inquire what was done by the Parliament of England, in 1641, after the King had sent in his protest. Why, the Lords, who before had differed in opinion with the Commons on the subject of the prerogative—yes, sir, those peers who had before considered the doctrine which denied the authority to press the freeborn subject as "new, and contrary to the usage and custom of all times," as many now declare our denial of the President's right to remove even a marshal who shall not refuse, at his bidding, to execute a decision of one of our courts, if the President choose to consider it unconstitutional, as new and contrary to all former usage—those very tory peers, I say, voted with the Commons, that the King's protest was a manifest breach of the privileges of Parliament. Clarendon informs us, that, as soon as the King's proposition was received, the divided Lords and Commons immediately united themselves in a petition to the King, declaring "that, amongst the privileges of Parliament, it was their ancient and undoubted right, that his majesty ought not to take notice of any matter in agitation or debate, in either House of Parliament, but by their information and agreement; and that his majesty ought not to propound any condition, provision, or limitation, to any bill or act, in debate or preparation, in either House of Parliament; or to declare his consent or dissent, his approbation or dislike of the same, before it be presented to him in due course of Parliament. They declared that all those privileges had been lately broken, to their great sorrow and grief, in that speech which his majesty had made to them, wherein he took notice of a bill for pressing of soldiers, and offered a salvo jure and provisional clause to be added to it before it was presented to him; and, therefore, they besought him, by his royal power, to protect them in those and the other privileges of this high court of Parliament; and that he would not, for the time to come, break or interrupt them; and that, for the reparation of them in that their grievance and complaint, he would declare and make known the name of such person, by whose misinformation and evil counsel his majesty was induced to the same, that he might receive condign punishment."

"And having delivered this petition," says the royal historian, "they no more considered Ireland till this manifest breach should be repaired—which they resolved nothing should do but the passing of the bill"—and so, at the end, after a long controversy between the whigs and tories of that day, between the people or Parliament on the one side, and the King on the other, the King, he adds, "was compelled to pass the bill for pressing, which the Commons had prepared." Yes, sir, the whigs of 1641 refused to transact any other business, under these circumstances, until the breach of their privileges was repaired. The object of the "salvo jure," or protest of the monarch, was to gain all the supplies for his army without a surrender of his prerogative. The object of the President now is, to obtain our consent to all his appointments, and to gain all the appropriations for the salaries of all his officers, as he terms them, not only without a surrender of his asserted prerogative of unlimited power over them all, but in defiance of the Senate, and while he compels us to admit his claim on our own records. Sir, I desire to imitate at least a part of the example set me in the illustrious precedent of 1641. I will not fall below the standard of opposition to kingly prerogative and executive encroachment, established by that Parliament which brought a British monarch to terms, and to which we are indebted for the first light of civil liberty. This act of Charles, in 1641, was one of that series of aggravations which eventually brought the English tyrant to the block. It remains for the American Senate to say, whether it will proceed to consider the other business of the session, before its own character and its own just claims and privileges have been vindicated and re-asserted, by the proper disposition of this protest. But, for myself, I repeat that, viewing this as a flagrant breach of privilege, and an attempt to lecture and intimidate the Senate, because it has dared to do
